There are men in this House who, from the habit of bringing cheap prejudices into things which ought to be entirely free from prejudice, seem perfectly capable of believing that the banks of the United States are likely some day to get together and form a conspiracy to throw themselves into the hands of a receiver. [Laughter.]

With the same dull and baffled insight into practical questions, Mr. Bryan insisted that the money power was about to take the American people by the throat and shake out of them what little remained of their industrial and commercial life. I take this occasion to say that if the money power did conspire to multiply the sorrows of poverty and debt in the United States, the conspiracy has turned out to be the worst failure imaginable.

During General Harrison's Administration, when it was comparatively easy to get into debt, I took advantage of the fair sailing which seemed to be before us and bought as much land as I could borrow money to make a payment on. Everybody seemed to be willing to loan money; they even stopped me on the street and asked me if I could not use a little money, and the most embarrassing thing I had to contend with during the campaign of 1896 was that these fellows all wanted to see me. I sent down word that I was not in. [Laughter.] They said that they would wait. [Renewed laughter.] So it took a good deal more ingenuity to keep my creditors in an agreeable state of mind during the campaign than it did to refute the bogus bimetalism of 16 to 1. [Laughter.] It is a relief to know that the burden of debt has been lifted not only from my own shoulders but from the scattered millions of my countrymen. The mortgages of the United States which have come due since Mr. Bryan's defeat have all been either paid or refunded at a rate of interest lower than ever before seen and tending lower still.

In view of that state of things, what becomes of the motto which Mr. Bryan saw carried in a procession at Lexington, Ky., in the fall of 1896? "I challenge you," said he, "to find in any one of the speeches that will be made this year by the opponents of free silver a single sentence which contains as much of political economy and common sense as is contained in that phrase, 'High money—low times.'"

That might have been political economy and common sense in 1896, but who will deny that it is balderdash and mere declamation now? I know what I am talking about. Not long ago I bought a piece of land which had a mortgage of $6,000, drawn at the rate of interest which prevailed in 1895 and having a reservation of the right to pay it in whole or in part on any interest day.

When the April interest came due this year I said to myself, "Would not it be a good idea for you to show your faith in Republican predictions? You told your constituents that if the standard of value was made secure public and private credit would be strengthened and that the interest on money, instead of going up, would go down. Would it not be a good thing to see whether it will operate in your own case or not?" I did not have the money and did not know where I would be able to get it, but I thought I would see whether the Republican platform was worth anything to me, and so when I wrote to the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company of Milwaukee, inclosing a draft for the interest due April 1, I added this postscript:

P. S.—Unless it is agreeable to your company to reduce the rate of interest on these notes to 5 per cent, I will feel obliged to pay them.

[Laughter.]

Three days afterwards I got a letter from the manager of the company, saying that my letter had been referred to the committee on finance, and in accordance with its report—it is entirely agreeable to our company to reduce the rate on your notes to 5 per cent, provided you will waive the right to pay them before they are due.

[Laughter.]

I want to say to you, boys, that I have had a good many hard knocks in my time and a good many hand-to-hand conflicts with trouble; I have heard you speak about the conspiracies of Wall street and Lombard street until I have sometimes felt like sharing your fears for the future, and I tell you now that I never in my life, before I got that letter, felt that I had the money power of Europe and America on the dead run. [Loud laughter.]

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Does the gentleman give his experience in that business transaction as the rule which governs the Republican party?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is the experience of every farmer, of every business man, of every man in the least interested in the borrowing and lending of money.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. You do not seem to catch my question. I mean when you deceived that insurance company.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I did not deceive them at all; I simply bluffed them. [Great laughter on the Republican side.] Is there a Democrat in this House who has any scruples against that? [Renewed laughter.]

In other words, my countrymen, three years under the Administration of William McKinley has taken all of the terror out of the gold standard, not only for the Republican party, but for the industrious millions of America. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. I thought you said that we had the gold standard since 1834.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But we have had several Democratic Administrations in the meantime, and I am talking now about the effect of the last election and about our desire and purpose to give expression in the law to the verdict of the people taken three years ago. I say frankly that it could not have been done two years ago or one year ago, but it can be done to-day by the unanimous vote of the Republican members of this House, because our pathway has been lit up by the experience of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is gratifying also to say that there is not a man on this side that is constrained by the action of the caucus, for the vote in the caucus was a unanimous vote if I may be pardoned for letting out a secret which I have already seen in the newspapers. [Laughter.]

Here, as the American people stand at the beginning of a new era, full of hope and courage, we propose to equip the business community with the best tool of exchange known to modern commerce. We propose to send our ships into all harbors, as we have raised our flag in the uttermost parts of the earth; we want it understood in Europe and America, in Africa, and in Asia, and in the islands of the sea that there is no longer any question as to what the standard dollar of the United States is. [Applause.] We want a draft on New York, expressed in dollars, drawn in Manila, to be as intelligible in the Orient as if drawn in pounds sterling on the Bank of England.

Wherever our fleets go, wherever our flag floats, we will place our dealings with the world above suspicion and beyond reproach. [Applause.] And so we are going to listen respectfully to your speeches; and while we may smile to ourselves as you attack the hydra-headed monsters of Lombard street and of Wall street, we intend to quietly write in the laws of this country what has always been the practice of the Government, that every obligation of the United States shall be paid in gold.

When a man comes to the counter of our Treasury we are going to lay down two coins before him, the gold dollar and the silver dollar. We will say to him, "There are our coins; they are exactly of equal value; one is the standard and the other is at par with the standard; the credit of the United States, all that we are, all that we have, is pledged to make one just as good as the other; take your choice. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is presented as the caucus measure of the Republican party. That party is in possession of both the executive and legislative branches of the Government. It is therefore safe to assume that the bill contains all the combined wisdom of the greatest minds in the dominant party upon the subject of finance; in other words, that it is the very best upon that subject of which you gentlemen on the other side of the House are capable. Were you capable of anything better, I fancy that you would have lost no time in telling us so. I represent a constituency in the city of New York that will probably be as vitally affected by the passage of this bill as will any in the United States. If I am to vote for it, I must be convinced not only that it does no harm, but that it does good, and that it improves existing conditions. There is a class of men who sincerely believe that all ills can be remedied by legislation; that no evil can be so great that an act of Congress will not set it right. I believe that one of the curses of our country is too much legislation, and that unless positive, actual good can be accomplished it is better to let well enough alone.

I take it that the purpose that has actuated the majority in introducing this bill, that has set them tinkering with our national finances, that has caused them to proceed in this extraordinarily hasty and indecent manner, is the ambition to live up to a certain pledge said to be contained in the last Republican national platform. I confess that it is a helpful and a hopeful sign that the Republican party is willing to live up to any promise whatsoever. [Laughter.] Hastily conceived and crudely drawn, its consequences unweighed and its results unknown, the Republican majority is to be dragged into voting for this bill in proof of the alleged conversion of its leaders from the Republican bimetallicism of 1892 to the new doctrine of Republican monometallicism of 1896.

I do not wish it understood that I advocate the present system of bank-note currency. The first direct consequence of the enactment of this bill will be a very great rise in the market price of Government bonds. Let me illustrate by one class of bonds. In 1895, when the then President of the United States was negotiating with the so-called "bond syndicate" for the issue of a fifty-million-dollar loan, the gentlemen who composed that syndicate agreed to take a 3 per cent gold bond at par instead of a 4 per cent coin bond authorized by the act of January 14, 1875, at 104½. In other words, in their opinion, and it is conceded that they are the shrewdest, ablest financiers living, a 4 per cent coin bond at 104½ is equal in value to a 3 per cent gold bond at par. Now, the enactment of the bill before the House will at once make all our coin bonds gold bonds, and according to the theory of the bond syndicate, which I am unwilling to dispute, a 4 per cent coin bond at 104½ will be equal in value to a 4 per cent gold bond at 133½; but the coin bonds that were issued at 104½ are now worth in the market 134. So that by this reasoning the substitution of the word "gold" for the word "coin" must increase their market price to 171, an increase of 27½ per cent. If this be true in reference to this one issue, it will necessarily be true in reference to all our outstanding coin bonds.

It may be said in answer to this that my figures are exaggerated and that our coin bonds are to-day virtually gold bonds and selling on a gold basis, and that the substitution of the word "gold" for the word "coin" will not increase their market value. If this is true, then our credit is not nearly as good as is that of Great Britain, a proposition that I fancy no member of this House will care to indorse. The average price of British consols during the year 1897 was a trifle under 113. Were the interest increased to 4 per cent the consol would be worth 164½; yet the consol is not by any manner of means as desirable a bond, even at the same rate of interest, as our 1925 4 per cents will be when made gold bonds. If our 1925 4 per cents are to-day gold bonds, when reduced to the terms of consols they would be worth only 92, or $210 less, bond for bond, than consols.

I pass over the fact that the substitution of the word "gold" for the word "coin" will result in presenting an unearned bonus of $60,056,735 to the holders of the loan of 1925 alone. If this bill is of such vital importance to the country, as its supporters halfheartedly insist, the mere presentation to the national bondholders of an unearned premium of 27½ per cent should not be allowed to weigh against it. But let us consider what will be the effect of the rise in the market price of our bonds.

Another section of this bill permits our national banks to issue bank notes up to the par value of their holdings in United States bonds, instead of up to 90 per cent, as they are at present authorized, and substitutes a franchise tax for the present tax of 1 per cent on bank-note issues. Why? Because it is conceded, and rightly so, that the market price of Government bonds is to-day so high that it is more profitable for our national banks to sell their bond holdings and to reinvest the proceeds in other securities than it is to hold them as collateral for the issue of bank notes up to 90 per cent of the par value of their holdings. This bill proposes to increase the authorized issue of bank notes one-ninth, while at the same time it increases the market value of our bonds one-fourth. If it is unprofitable to-day to issue bank notes, how much more unprofitable will it be after the enactment of this bill?

Under present conditions for every 4 per cent bond of the issue of 1925 held by a national bank $900 in bank notes may be issued, which, if loaned at 4 per cent with the tax of 1 per cent deducted, means a profit of $27 a year; add to this $40 interest on the bond makes a total profit of $67. Were the bond sold at the market price and the proceeds, $1,340, invested at 4 per cent, the profit for the year would be $53.60, or only $13.40 in favor of the bank-note issue, scarcely enough to pay for the annoyance of submitting to the law in reference to bank-note issues.

By the proposed plan, for every 4 per cent bond of the issue of 1925 held by a national bank, $1,000 in bank notes may be issued, which, if loaned at 4 per cent with no tax deducted, would mean a profit of $40 a year; add to this $40 interest on the bond would make a profit of $80. Were the bond sold at what would be its market price, the word "gold" having been substituted for the word "coin," and the proceeds, $1,710, invested at 4 per cent, the profit for the year would be $68.40, or only $11.60 in favor of the bank-note issue and $1.80 less than under existing conditions. Instead of increasing the number of banks of issue, this bill, if enacted, will reduce them to the vanishing point, and cause the disappearance of the $243,842,068 in bank notes outstanding December 1, 1899, and the consequent contraction of the currency to that extent.

UNDER PRESENT SYSTEM.
Interest on one bond at 4 per cent	$40.00
Bank lends $900 in notes at 4 per cent	36.00
Total	76.00
Less 1 per cent tax	9.00
Net profit for one year	67.00
Bank sells bond and invests proceeds, $1,340, at 4 per cent	53.60
Difference in favor of bank-note issue	13.40
UNDER PROPOSED SYSTEM.
Interest on one bond at 4 per cent	$40.00
Bank lends $1,000 in notes at 4 per cent (no tax)	40.00
Net profit for one year	80.00
Bank sells bond and invests proceeds, $1,710, at 4 per cent	68.40
Difference in favor of bank-note issue	11.60
Or $1.80 less than and in favor of existing system.

During the debate I have heard this remarkable utterance:

There can be no contraction of the currency under this system, for the reason that either the note is in circulation, or, if redeemed, its equivalent is in circulation.

This statement is worthy of the ignorance that has inspired the bill. There are in circulation $405,353,656 Treasury notes and United States notes which, under the terms of this bill, must be redeemed in gold, and once redeemed not reissued except for gold. For the sake of argument, let us assume that the enactment of this bill will find as much gold in the Treasury as there was December 7, 1899; that is, $239,462,213.43.

This is an assumption which I think is entirely unwarranted, but I am willing to make it for the purpose of presenting the case for this bill in the most favorable light possible. When all this gold has been used for redemption purposes, there will still remain $165,761,443 of notes outstanding to be redeemed, and, moreover, the gold reserve must be brought up to the $100,000,000 mark. In other words, gold to that amount must be procured by the sale of bonds, and must necessarily be taken from the gold in circulation; so that by the most charitable view of this bill the circulation will be contracted $265,761,443, and the bonded debt of the country will have been increased by that amount at an annual cost of $7,972,843. This will mean a total contraction of $509,603,511.

In estimating the volume of the currency in a country it is necessary to take into consideration the check money, which in all civilized nations plays so important a part. It is necessary to consider the rapidity with which credit can be transferred by means of an extended and sound banking system. Thus India, one of the most populous and also one of the poorest countries on earth, has a per capita circulation of $2.39; China a per capita circulation of $1.96—both almost ignorant of the use of check money and of banking facilities in our acceptance of the term; while France and Germany, much less populous, but far more prosperous and well provided with banks, have, respectively, per capita circulations of $35.19 and $19.38, without taking into account the very large amount of check money that circulates side by side with the legal-tender money.

The volume of currency necessary for the transaction of business in any country depends, not upon the size of the population, but upon the amount of that country's wealth. As it is impossible to estimate with any accuracy the amount of wealth in a country, it has become the custom, for the purposes of comparison, to express the amount of circulating medium in proportion to its population. While this is not always a safe measure of the amount of needed circulation, it is safe to say that in ordinarily prosperous times the per capita of circulation will represent the amount required in the ordinary transactions of business. On the 1st of December, 1899, the total circulation per capita in the United States was $25.85, which probably represents the smallest amount of circulation with which business can be carried on without resorting to temporary and clumsy makeshifts, such as clearing house certificates. As a result of the contraction which will be caused by this bill, the circulation per capita will be reduced to $19.21, or less than that of almost any other solvent country on earth, with the exception of the United Kingdom, whose banking facilities are far superior to our own and which possesses an elastic currency the like of which we have never known.

You have claimed that you were the friend of the business man in this country. You have insisted that, as a party, your one ambition was to make this country prosperous. Through no effort of yours the country is prosperous, and now you assume that you were the cause of its prosperity, but you are unwilling to let well enough alone, and propose to improve conditions which you had no part in bringing about. Any business man will tell you that one of the chief dangers to the prosperity of this country is the inelasticity of our present monetary system; that under present conditions our currency is not capable of expansion or of contraction to meet the needs of trade. Every man employed in trade realizes that he has constantly hanging over his head, threatening him with bankruptcy, the danger of "tight money."

If this is true in the great commercial cities, it is doubly a menace in sections of the country far removed from the money centers. You have the Government in all its branches; you have the power; you profess a philanthropic friendship for the business interests of this country; and yet, instead of trying to remedy the condition of affairs that exists to-day, you propose by this bill to make matters infinitely worse by withdrawing the only semi-elastic currency we have, by contracting the circulation 25 per cent, and by reducing the per capita to $19.21. The enactment of this bill, revolutionizing the financial system of the country from top to bottom, contracting the currency and reducing the per capita, will be followed by a money famine which must lead to the destruction of confidence and credit and to a commercial panic the like of which this country has never seen.

You are willing to risk all this; you are willing to sacrifice that prosperity which you claim has come because of you, and which we claim has come despite you; you are willing to ruin thousands and to plunge hundreds of thousands into undeserved poverty, light heartedly, unthinkingly, for the purpose of redeeming a platform promise, for the purpose of a little cheap political advantage. The results of the enactment of this bill will be, first, the making of our already inelastic currency still more rigid; second, the increase of our bonded debt over $265,000,000, and of our annual interest charges nearly $8,000,000; third, the contraction of the currency by over $509,000,000 and the reduction of the per capita circulation to $19.21; and, fourth, the substitution for the endless chain of greenbacks, as at present, of an endless chain of silver dollars, to be redeemed, reissued, and redeemed in gold as often as presented.

With a proper regard for my duty as a Representative from New York, with a conscientious desire to serve the best interests of my country, I can not bring myself to vote for this bill.

I have heard it said, Mr. Chairman, that some gentlemen on this side of the House, some sound-money Democrats, intend to vote for this bill, because they are convinced that by so doing they will aid the cause of sound money. I sincerely trust that I have been misinformed. I had firmly believed until recently that the Democratic party upon the floor of this House would present a united front in opposition to this bill. I had hoped that those who believe in the free coinage of silver at the fixed ratio of 16 to 1, without the aid or consent of any other nation, would have been joined by those who, while believing in bimetallism, doubt the possibility of maintaining the parity of the metals under free coinage.

Sound-money Democrats, this bill does not aid the cause of sound money. I beg you, I implore you, before you resolve to cast your votes for it, bring to its consideration all the patriotism that is in you; ask yourselves if the passage of this bill will not be the end of all financial legislation, at least during our time; ask yourselves if the passage of this bill will not forever prevent a just and a proper reform of the currency; ask yourselves if this bill is not the severest blow that has ever been aimed at a sound financial system. And if, as I believe you will, you decide that this is a bad bill, and that its passage will not be for the best interests of the country, then stand up side by side with the party you all love and to which you all belong, and help to cast an undivided and a united Democratic vote against one of the worst pieces of legislation ever submitted to the United States Congress. [Loud and long-continued applause on the Democratic side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOPKINS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, sundry messages from the President in writing were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair. Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to detain the committee with any remarks this afternoon. I thought if I should speak at all it would be at a later stage in the course of this discussion. But it seems that no one upon our side is prepared to speak just now, and much of my time may be taken up in committee duties after to-day, and so, with the indulgence of my fellow-members, I will address myself, hurriedly and necessarily imperfectly, to the pending question.

One might wonder, at first impression, as to what is the reason for the legislation now proposed; from whence comes the call for its enactment. But if at all acquainted with the history of the country in recent times you would have no difficulty in answering the query. The call does not come from the great mass of the American people; it does not come from the level of American citizenship; not from the producing elements of the country; but it comes from those who hold the mortgage executed by the Republican party, for value received, in 1896—from those who have been clamorous for fulfillment of the promises then so lavishly made to them.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], who was eloquent and interesting, as he always is upon every subject on which he speaks—Mr. DOLLIVER says that with gold so plentiful the money question has grown stale and unprofitable in his estimation. He says he thinks that in July, 1896, the general belief prevailed throughout the country that the forces which gave to the world the promise of a battle royal upon the lines drawn by the people at Chicago were sure to win. He tells us that as he then saw us rally around the standard of that magnificent specimen of manhood and democracy, William J. Bryan, of Nebraska [applause on the Democratic side], he thought we were about to sweep the country, and that victory was destined to perch upon the banner of that champion of the people. He says that but a short time afterwards, in the progress of the discussion of the money question which took place among the people of the country, enlightened by the politicians of his own party, the whole aspect of the question was changed, especially when a voice came to the people from Canton, Ohio, promulgating a doctrine just the reverse of that which Bryan and his friends preached.

My recollection is not the same as that of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa. I think he is in error. My recollection is that owing to events, not necessary to discuss now, and which could not be treated properly in the very short time at my command, a very different condition of affairs then existed. The Republicans felt secure in their strength; thought themselves invincible; thought the victory theirs—the battle so one-sided as to be won even before it was fought.

It was not a change of opinion, brought about by reason and argument, as claimed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], that gave the victory of November, 1896, to his party; the battle was fought and won on an entirely different principle, and by other agencies.

Not ready to meet their opponents on the hustings, not prepared to discuss the momentous questions of the hour, man to man, with argument against argument, all the influences and agencies of concentrated wealth, the despotic power of employers in tyrannous control over the employed, were brought into play. The mechanic was threatened with the closing of the factory where he found work and wages. The man whose daily toil and its reward furnished daily subsistence for himself and his family was told he must face discharge and beggary if he did not support the cause which the gentleman from Iowa says was so abundantly sustained in argument. Out of the strong boxes, seldom opened at the call of distress, seldom opened when philanthropy and nobility of spirit are abroad, from out of those strong boxes came great quantities of hoarded wealth, gathered by unjust laws and by the perversion and abuse of laws in themselves not wrong. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Frightened, scared, panic-stricken, your party mortgaged its soul and body, its present, past, and future, together with the substance of the people, in order to raise the means with which to overcome, not by the force of argument, not by right reason, not by an appeal to the nobler instincts of humanity, but by an appeal to all that is sordid, all that is selfish, all that is corrupt and tyrannical, the American manhood that followed the flag unfurled at Chicago. You gathered together the united influence of wealth and despotic control over the destinies of the many, and mortgaged yourselves and these United States to increase the hold of these classes upon the American public, if out of their abundant substance, if out of the storehouse of their vast power, aid would come and save you from the judgment and the ballots of the millions of unpurchased and untrammelled American citizens.

The appeal was not in vain. The mortgage can not be repudiated because the condition failed, because the consideration was lacking. You carried the election of 1896, not because you overbore us in the conflict of reason, not because you appealed to loftier sentiments of American manhood, or assured an expectant American public, looking only for what was right and just, that your policies were sounder and would bring more in fruition than ours, but because you had the corrupt and tremendous power of money, which you used unsparingly, and because you had the vast power of numerous corporations holding in control the destinies of thousands, aye, of millions, of toilers, and used that power without mercy. These powers, massed and gathered, won your victory of 1896, won it against a man who received in that election over a million votes more than were ever cast for anyone who battled in all the years past under the same standard that he bore. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Say what you can in glorification of that victory. If you are proud of it, we are doubly proud of the noble fight that we gave you, clean from start to finish. We were overborne, but we were not overborne in the field of logic. We were not overborne in the forum of morals. We were not carried down because you were right and because we were wrong, but because you summoned to your aid agencies mightier for the time being than the will of the unpurchased and the unpurchasable American citizens in opposition to you. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And now you come to fulfill the conditions upon which you won. In the years past you have hesitated and delayed; you have equivocated and quibbled. In 1896 you appealed to the people by your platform and, in all the Western and Southern regions of the country, by tongue and pen, as bimetalists, better and truer than we were. You asserted that you were going to bring bimetalism, the free coinage of silver, not in what you denominated the reckless way in which we advocated it, but in a safe, sound, secure way. You would send your commissioners abroad, to all the nations of the earth; would gather into one great bond all bimetalists, theoretical and practical. Then the mints would be opened. Then free coinage would be established and be maintained upon a safe, sound, and secure basis. Were you honest then or did you seek to deceive the people? If you were dishonest then, what evidence have you that you are honest now? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If you were honest then, what evidence do you bring that you are right now? But three short years have elapsed since your platform was made, in which you declared for free silver coinage by international agreement, which you solemnly pledged yourselves to promote, and yet you are now advocating precisely what, in all the South and West, you then repelled with scorn. There could not then be found in those regions a corporal's guard of you who claimed to be anything else than bimetalists. You were "safe" bimetalists, "sound" bimetalists, "bimetalists by the right route," "bimetalists upon the solid ground," "bimetalists who were going to carry the country to the double standard, not with jolts and jars and backsliding and danger, but steadily and securely, there to remain while the ages should roll on."

Now you are going to put the country upon the gold standard. You say it has been upon the gold standard since 1834. In the convincing language of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], if not upon the gold standard in 1834, surely then from 1853; and if not upon the gold standard in 1853, then unquestionably upon it in 1873; and I suppose, if perchance not entirely and indisputably upon it in 1873, then most certainly upon it by your legislation of 1899. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If we are upon the gold standard and have been there, lo, these many years, do you suppose the people who hold the mortgage that you executed to secure the victory in 1896 have been clamoring merely for a shadow? Do they not know what they are asking, and have they no means of estimating what they will get? Do you impute to those people absolute idiocy? If they are to get nothing by this legislation, why do they ask it and why do you give it, in discharge of your great obligation to them, for giving you the victory in 1896 by corruption and by terror and by threats?

But are you really doing nothing in this bill? Is this bill a mere gentle bit of play, a mere exhibition of ability to plaster upon the statute book something new? Is there nothing in it? The gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN], who has just delivered a most thoughtful address, has pointed out how you will be giving as a bonus—not perhaps as a bonus; for you promised it and were paid for giving it, but how you will be giving, all the same—to the holders of the obligations of the Government millions and millions of dollars, according to your own philosophy and declarations, and according to theirs, by the passage of this bill. Where is your right to do it? Where have you the warrant to place upon the American people an additional dime of burden without giving to them something in compensation for what you exact from them?

What right have you to put into the bonds of the United States now outstanding anything which will enable those who hold them, wherever dispersed the world over, to exact from the American taxpayer an additional farthing, or a farthing of one metal when he has the legal right to use another metal in payment? Where is your warrant or authority for it? Do you proclaim that you are going to create "confidence" in the Government while you boast of its credit? You have not the pitiful excuse that sufficed for the passage of the credit strengthening act of years ago, which for years and years worked hardship and wrong upon the people of this Union. You have no such pretense for this act. You say it does not matter whether the word "gold" is or is not in the bonds, whether issued or to be issued under this bill enacted into the law. But let me remind you, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN] has done, that when you issued these bonds the people who were to buy them—the bond mongers—told you that if you would write the word "gold" in the bonds they would give you more for them and that they would bring more on the market. The Congress of the United States refused to authorize the issue of gold bonds. Every obligation of the United States may be lawfully paid with silver dollars.

The most reckless of you will not dare deny that every obligation of the Government is payable in coin, whether of gold or silver. We have the right under the Constitution and under the law, the right in morals, the right in the courts, the right in fairness to the people, to discharge all these obligations by paying in gold coin or silver coin, or both, as may be best for us, we deciding.

Now, then, you are proposing to give many millions of dollars to these bondholders, to give them not of your own substance, but of the substance of the people of the United States. You are proposing now, when expenditures are mountain high, swelling far above the loftiest level of extravagance and waste ever reached at any time in the past—you are proposing now, not to check these expenditures in the interest of economy, not to stay this waste, but to give millions, tens of millions, hundreds of millions of dollars to those who hold the obligations of these United States of America which are to be met and discharged, principal and interest, from the toil and sacrifice and savings of our people—aye, often from what is necessary to feed and to clothe American men, women, and children.

By this innocent little bill this is to come to pass: All the obligations of the United States shall be discharged with gold, and then will be presented that beautiful spectacle—over the anticipation of which the gentleman from Iowa revels in blissful eloquence—when the creditor of the Government, approaching the Treasury of the United States, will have laid out for his inspection, to delight his hungry eyes and to increase the palpitation of his fluttering heart, the gold and the silver, and there he will be told, "Take your choice; one is just as good as the other, but the obligations are payable in gold, gold! gold!! The contract has been changed and changed in your favor. The option of the Government has been given away by the law of a profligate Congress. The option of the Government has been surrendered in payment of a party pledge and promise made years ago in order to carry an election which could not be carried by fair means. Take your choice, but the obligation is payable in gold!" How the gentleman from Iowa revels in the prospect, revels in the vision which spreads out before him, haunts him, perhaps, in his dreams of these money changers demanding gold for bonds payable in coin! The bonds are outstanding in every country and clime and are all provided for by existing law. It seems that the edict to change the contracts and the law has gone forth.

The Congress of the United States, by direction of the powers that control the dominant party, in pursuance of a pledge in the interest of the masters of the same party, is about to write "gold" into every contract existing, every contract to be made, public and private, thus adding greatly to the burdens of the masses of the people and donating to a privileged class, wherever its members may be, whether in this land or any land under the shining sun, the rich booty. Meanwhile the money question is no longer of interest, you say, for eloquent and distinguished gentlemen like Mr. DOLLIVER find that it has palled upon the taste, has lost power over the imagination, and no longer holds the fancy of the fanciful.

By your bill the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue bonds at will. What more monstrous than to empower a single officer, not elected by the people even, but appointed by the President, to mortgage as often and as heavily as he shall please to do, and for no better or more urgent purpose than you disclose, all the men, women, and children and all the property in our great Republic, not only the persons and things in being, but millions of American citizens and billions of dollars worth of property yet to be!

By this same bill you make all debts, public and private, present and future, payable under existing law in "coin"—silver coin or gold coin—payable in gold coin alone. Why thus rob the public? Why thus rob the citizen in his private business affairs? Do you fancy you can do all this and escape the righteous vengeance which your misdeeds merit? May not the stern slogan of the voters, the inspired refrain of the ballots, be "Thou shalt not steal?"

The coin debts and obligations of to-day, both public and private, all the debts and moneyed obligations of all the to-morrows—you are determined to make "gold," the god of the Briton and your god by adoption, the exacting measurer of them all. Do not count too confidently upon popular toleration of such conduct.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] says you will listen to our remarks, but will vote solidly for the gold standard, bond-issuing, national-bank trust bill. He says that in the Republican caucus not a vote was thrown against this policy or this bill. I wish to nail that where it is, because the day is not far distant when in many of the Congressional districts of the United States, if I do not miss my guess, Republican members of this House will be found giving as their excuse and apology and justification for voting against the interests of their constituents and for this bill the caucus edict of their party and their duty to party. They will plead that their caucus overruled them, and that after a struggle valiant but vain they accepted the verdict, as in Republican duty bound. Out of the mouth of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] let there be confutation and confusion to each one of these hypocrites and pretenders. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Every one of you from the prairies of the West, from the mountain States, from the States of the far North, from the South—every one of you voted in your caucus for the policy which you are ready now to vote for in the House. Do not go back to your constituents and plead the "baby act," do not talk about the lofty Republican party to which you belong and whine that you, as a dutiful member of that party, and humble at that particular time, bowed in obedience to the edict of your caucus, submitted to the decree of wise men in council. Go bravely back if you can, go honestly at least, and say, "I voted for this policy in caucus and I stand by it." Do it if you dare, and then when the Fifty-seventh Congress is organized there will not preside in that chair a gentleman of your party faith. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

There is great trouble, it seems, with some matters that appear in the book written by Mr. Bryan following the election of 1896, and called "The First Battle." The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] invested in that book at a bargain, and if the gentleman from Iowa reads that book he will know more than the gentleman from Iowa has furnished us evidence that he now knows. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

There has been a large quantity of gold produced in the last two years, we are told; the silver chimera has vanished into thin air and no longer has any interest for some gentlemen.

Coming down to the mathematical precision of the statistician from Iowa—and in using the word "statistician" I do not reflect on the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] [laughter]—the statistician from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] says that if the mints of the nation had been open to free coinage only about 150,000,000 silver dollars, the depreciated dollars, the 40-cent dollars, as the gentleman denominates them, would have been coined in three years and rolled out and put in circulation among the people, while wonders have been wrought, he says, during the beneficent reign of the amiable person to whose "little vine-clad porch at Canton, Ohio," were carried, at no expense to themselves, car-loads and train loads of men, in order to affect the result of the election, by creating an appearance of unanimity concerning vine-clad porch sentiments. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Who does not know that mints are made with ease and that our mint capacity could be increased at will?

It was contended in 1896 that prices, in a general way, depend upon the quality of money available to measure the commodities sold and for sale. In 1899 the gentlemen on the other side indorsed that theory, by proclaiming that there is now no need of silver coinage; that now the gold standard may be firmly established, because there is a larger quantity of money in the country than there was before. Who was right in 1896 upon this point? The gentleman from Iowa says that in 1896 there was great scarcity of money; that it was locked up and could not be had; that prices were low and times were hard. Money is abroad now, he says, and everything is prosperous, prosperity abounding, prosperity universal, the idle man, if industrious, something that can not be found, a vanished goblin of the past, a shadow that fitted before our vision, but is gone, leaving the beneficent radiance of McKinleyism absolutely unobscured. In 1896, I say, it was contended by those who rallied around the banner of William J. Bryan that when you increase the quantity of primary money in the country you increase the level of prices. In 1899 the gentlemen who then opposed that theory say the volume of money is increased, and prices are advanced, to the extent that it is not necessary to resort to silver coinage for more money; and now they are bold enough and expectant enough, in remembrance of favors past, to support the pending gold-standard bill.

You take credit for the discoveries in the Klondike. You put upon your own credit side of the ledger all that has been gathered from the golden sands of southern Africa. All that came from the wondrously rich mines of Cripple Creek you simply appropriate as either produced or brought to light by the direct agency of that little vine-clad porch in Canton, Ohio. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

How long is this outpouring of gold to continue? Can some of your wise men tell us what the rate of increase will be; what the rate of decrease? In the history of the world many times the world has thought that there was about to be a plethora of the precious metals. Not alone has it been thought in some quarters that silver would be too abundant. Only a short time back certain nations of the world, as you know, alarmed at the great discoveries of that metal in California and Australia, demonetized gold upon the ground that gold was going to become too plentiful to be useful for a money metal.

How long is the gold output to continue? Do you know? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] says that we were very much at fault in 1896 because no one could say precisely and absolutely what would be the effect of restored free silver coinage. We showed you by the light of history the ground of our hope and belief. We gave to you facts from the lips and the works of historians, living and dead, as to what had been done. We gave you the history of the centuries. We asked you to behold the landmarks of the ages. We said that what had been done through a long series of years, what transpired in the flight of the centuries, we believed could be made to happen again.

You are now in a place where you are to do some prophesying. How much gold is to be produced next year, and how much the year after, and how much the year after that? How much gold is necessary in this country? Has the level been reached? If not, when will it be reached? It would be like idle children playing upon the seashore, making marks in the sand to be obliterated, one after another, by each incoming wave, for you to enter upon that field of conjecture. All of history is against your proposition that gold is going to be produced in enormous quantities for any considerable period of time. But if it should be; if, contrary to all the experience of men, contrary to the reasonings which the facts of past ages give us, gold should be produced in vast quantities for a considerable period of time, those of you who survive the deluge that you are inviting, those of you who escape from the waters which you are about to let loose, and who return here when that condition of things exists, will be found loud and clamorous for stopping the coinage of gold.

I believe this country never has suffered, never will suffer, from a superabundance of good, sound legal-tender money. I am one of those who believe, and my reading of history sustains me in that belief, that the world never has known the day or the hour, nor man a country or section of a country or a spot in a country, where there has been real genuine suffering or hardship because of the existence of too much primary money, too much money of final redemption, too much money, the measure of all things that pass in the commercial world by purchase and sale. Do you know of such a country? If you do, enlighten those of us who do not, please, by giving us some of the facts in relation to it. I know and you know of times even in our own short experience—not to go beyond that, not to trust to the words of others, as found in history—you and I ourselves know of times of dire distress prevailing from shore to shore, aye, the universe over, on account of the scarcity of money; when prices went down and business was stagnant, when men suffered for bread and were clamoring for work, all because of the scarcity of primary money.

How do you know and how can you know that the world is about to produce, or that the world has produced, a surplus of the materials out of which to make solid and substantial full legal-tender gold and silver money? That period never existed in the history of the world. How do you know it has come now? How do you know it is to come? How do you know it is in the near future or in the future at all? You do not know; you are merely making good your pledge to the money mongers.

How can your legislation be in the interest of the great public?

Is it not in the interest of the masses of the people to have money cheap, as compared with commodities, in order that commodities as compared with money may be comparatively high?

"But," says the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], "prices have advanced; prices are high." And, pray, tell us how have they advanced? Some of you are associated with trusts. Some of you know that prices have advanced, and that the trusts have advanced them in many lines. Wire nails and barbed wire and thousands of other things have advanced in price. They have advanced mightily, as every man must know who is interested in the profits of their production; as every man must know who is interested in the trusts that control them; as every one of the plain thousands and millions of the men who are compelled to buy these articles of prime necessity is compelled to know. Prices of some things have advanced; prices of some things are higher. What made them so? In many instances the trusts did it; not because of increased cost of production; not because of increased wages to those who produced the articles; not because of increased prices to those who furnished the raw material, but by bold robbery on the part of those who have formed the trusts, under the shadow and protection of the very people who are ready now by this bill to form a more gigantic trust, the trust of trusts, the central trust, the trust around which all others are expected to revolve, and to which all others are expected to gravitate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They tell us that prosperity prevails everywhere. Is that true? Are there not special reasons for its existence where it is found? Is it universal? On the contrary, is it not a fact that right in this city property can be bought to-day, in the sunlight of this bogus McKinley prosperity, for less money than it would command two or three or five years ago? There is not a State in the western or southern part of our Union where a great deal of property, in town and country, can not be bought to-day for less money than would buy it but a few years ago. There has been so much talk about prosperity being all-pervading and abiding that I am reminded of the people who are said, by telling frequently a thing which is not true, telling it with unctiousness, finally to believe it themselves. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Prosperity has been proclaimed here and there and everywhere. You proclaimed that it would come, and now you insist that it has come; that it is universal. Let your answer come, as come it will, from the hearthstones and from the ballots of the plain people of the land.

How many things have happened to produce this sporadic prosperity, prosperity here and there in spots? If three-fourths of all the buildings in this magnificent city were suddenly to be destroyed, vast prosperity would ensue in the building business and in the supply of all the materials necessary to build. Everybody able to buy would be forced to buy to replace what the ravages of the destroying element had robbed him of. Those unable to buy would be compelled to give place to those who could buy. The demand for labor would be intense. The pressure for building supplies, for all things most useful in the reconstruction of a desolated city, would be unprecedented. Every man who desired employment could secure it, and the would-be employer would not higgie with him as to the wages which he should receive. Would that be prosperity—making good again what had been lost, repairing the damage of the fire or flood or cyclone?

Gentlemen may forget that for some months this country has been at war. They may forget that a large share of the young men of the land went to Cuba and Porto Rico; that now many are in the distant Philippine Islands. They may forget that for months many thousands of these young men were detained in camps in this country, ready for departure to the seat of war, withdrawn from the active pursuits of life, consumers and no longer producers. You may recollect that there was an extraordinarily increased demand, an imperative demand, which had to be met at once, for all the various things necessary to equip and supply and sustain an army.

Munitions of war, clothing, food, means of transportation, were all in great demand. What could be the effect of all that but to increase activity in very many lines and, for the time being, to increase prosperity in all the avenues of trade, business, and manufacture into which that strongly imperative call went? Where is the evidence of prosperity outside of that? Where is the general building up, the general advancement, except that which comes from special reasons, easily traceable to causes which are temporary, which must pass with the events that called them into being? Be not too sure that while you prattle about prosperity, with wild speculators and reckless speculation all about you, the deep fires of a volcano which you fancy is extinct may not break forth suddenly, to spread financial panic and ruin far and wide.

One of the things that you propose to do in this bill is to take in and retire the greenbacks. How many of you who come from the States of the West, how many of you who have prated about the greenback being the creature of the Republican party and about the Republican party being its best friend, how many of you who have won your seats here by proclaiming love for that sainted money of the civil war, how many of you are going back to your constituents to admit that you, in caucus and in the councils of your own party, voted for and advocated the measure which takes in and destroys the greenback?

It will not do to say to me that you will pay out the greenbacks again. The object of your legislation is to take them in and give power to the Secretary of the Treasury to divert them from the channels of trade, to keep them from the people of these United States.

The silver dollars which you are going to redeem in gold are dollars in which every obligation of the Government may be paid. We know, and pardon us if we believe you must know, that you will grievously wrong American manhood when you make standard silver dollars—half a billion of them nearly—redeemable in gold. You are unmindful of your duty to the masses, the people of the United States, whose support you got in part by means that were corrupt and by coercion that was odious and un-American. Worse still, you are betraying the people, who regarded you as sincere in your declaration that you really did look to the welfare of the masses of American citizens and would be mindful of them when you could do your will here, and therefore supported you.

It is a huge bank trust which you are to create. The gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN] thinks it will fail, because, he thinks, you are not offering sufficient inducement to the bondholders to tempt them to embark in the banking business. They think your legislation will enhance the value of the bonds by making them payable in gold, and you are depriving your countrymen of the right to use the silver half of the money of the country in paying them. Your scheme, however successful in the pockets and the minds of those who presented it, will be a bitter disappointment in its realization to the plain Republicans, who, forgotten by you, may forget you in turn or hold you in remembrance for deserved punishment.

You expect that a bank syndicate in the seat of financial empire in this country will be the sun of your new system and that around it will revolve as satellites the lesser banks. With a bank trust, mighty, far-reaching, almost omnipotent in financial affairs; with your other trusts, which you have created and foster in the interest of the Republican party, you may think you will be absolutely secure. It may be so. The special class to whom you appealed in 1896 see that their confidence was not misplaced, but are you secure, after all, in disregarding the interests and the rights of American citizenship? Will there not rise up against you in judgment your own words, speeches, platforms, and promises to the masses? The gentleman from Iowa says he does not care anything about that. He says he is not going to be held to what he did; not going to be held to what he said. [Applause.] Forgetful of what you said to your plain Republican constituents, indifferent as to them, you are keeping faith with the plutocratic mortgagees as if they alone gave you victory.

You say you are going to put this bill through by a unanimous Republican vote. You have taken your orders. The gentleman from Iowa says it has been whispered that they have taken their orders upon that side. The gentleman from Iowa says he has taken his orders—taken them from the farmers of the district in Iowa which he represents. Did those farmers call upon you to retire from their use, and the use of the American people, the greenbacks which you have landed so many times and of which, though you were not the father, you have certainly made yourself, by speech, the step-father? [Laughter.] Did they call upon you for legislation to destroy the silver dollar with which they transact their business and pay their taxes and debts? You are acting under orders, but you pretend to misunderstand the source of those orders. They come from elsewhere than the farmers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This bill is your remedy for evils, when you say there are none. This is an assurance for the future, which you say is already assured us. You are following in the way blazed by Old England. You are in line with the English system, but not in one thing alone. Why, lately you have put yourselves in closer touch with England and sympathize with her in her schemes of spoliation. Only in individual cases do you sympathize with the Boers of South Africa in their struggle for liberty against that country which smothered liberty in Ireland and has struck it down in every quarter of the globe. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

You are abandoning the aspirations of the people of these United States to be free themselves and to help others to freedom, aspirations as lofty and as noble as any that ever inspired man since the morning stars sang together. We were once a liberty-loving, liberty-respecting nation. We were an inspiration and an encouragement to other people. Now your sympathies are with those who are trying to crush out liberty and your proudest boast is that you are engaged in the business yourselves. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

won. But recollect that the approval of those who can be bought by partial legislation may not compensate you for the loss of others who have followed your standard from a devotion to principle which they thought you shared with them and who will not follow you when convinced that those principles no longer animate you, if they ever did. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

Do not count too securely upon the result in 1900. Recollect there will be gathered against you then men not drawn together under "orders," but coming as volunteers; men battling for homes and principles and liberty; men waging the fight that was waged in this country more than once in the century past; men standing upon principles proclaimed, defended, and illustrated by the bravest and best Americans that ever trod American soil. They will be there as volunteers; they will come from the farms and the shops, from the hills and from the valleys; and it will be a mighty host. Against them you may throw successfully your cohorts purchased by payment actually made and promises of things to be done, and then again you may not.

I have great reliance in American manhood when once aroused. Do not think that this defiance of their rights, this throwing to the winds of your own promises and your own professions, this legislation for classes against the masses, this iniquitous measure, will go unchallenged. Money again will be talked about at the fireside. Men will be gathered upon the street corners again. Again they will be making the gestures that the gentleman from Iowa made so artistically. Again the plain people will be found in conversation, in discussion; and these little groups, let me warn you, will assemble East and West and North and South, and great meetings will grow from them; and they will not assemble to praise or thank you. You may find that all the British friendship you have gathered in your endeavor to ingratiate yourself with the old "mother" who tried to strangle us in our infancy [laughter on the Democratic side], to assassinate us in the days of our youth, and who now, through you, is using us may fall short of your needs.

All the help you can get from corporations, with all the power of the money which you give them out of the people's purse, expecting that a goodly portion of it will be used for your benefit—all this superadded may not be enough. We will appeal to American manhood, to American patriotism. We will have again abroad in this land a spirit of inquiry and earnest discussion. Do not flatter yourselves that when the great conflict of 1900 is on we shall not be heard from; and let me warn you that when the battle is fought and the victory won it may not be necessary to go to the White House or to the "vine-clad cottage" at Canton, Ohio, with congratulations, but across the mighty Mississippi and over the prairies of the great West to a modest little home in Lincoln, Nebr. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill No. 1 "to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes," and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. And not for reference to a committee?

Be it further resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, directed to send a copy of this resolution to the Congressmen from Texas, and to the governor of each State at once, and to the legislatures of the several States as they convene, with a request of them to concur with us in this resolution.

COMMANDER JOSHUA BISHOP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Navy; which was read:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, December 9, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the petition of Joshua Bishop, commander, United States Navy, retired.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: I wish to call attention to rather a remarkable breach of our rules. It is a matter very unimportant in itself. It is that the head of one of the Departments transmits to the Senate the petition of a citizen who, I believe, is an officer under that Department.

The rule of the Senate requires that the petition shall be presented by a member; that it shall be presented under certain conditions; that it shall be indorsed in a certain fashion and presented at a certain time. I do not understand that it is the privilege of any Executive Department to undertake to determine the character or quality of a petition that should be presented, and that we should receive it as of course when so transmitted.

I merely call attention to this irregularity, not as having any importance whatever at present, but that it may not form a precedent.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to think that if an officer in the Navy desires some action by Congress there is any impropriety in having that request transmitted to this body by the Secretary of the Navy? Where is the harm?

Mr. HOAR. It is contrary to the Senate rule. It should be transmitted to some member of the body and by him presented.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it is to be treated strictly as a petition, I agree.

Mr. HOAR. It is. That is all there is to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it is not in proper form, that is another matter; but I conceive that a request by any naval officer for legislation for his benefit or for the benefit of the service may very wisely be submitted to the Secretary of the Navy and may very properly be transmitted by the Secretary of the Navy to Congress.

Mr. HOAR. There is no indorsement on this petition. It is a mere transmission of the petition of a citizen, who is a naval officer. What the Senator from New Hampshire says might wisely be done and is undoubtedly done in many cases; but this petition comes here contrary to our rule, which is that every petition or memorial shall contain so and so; that it shall be signed by the petitioner; that it shall have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, which this petition has not; and that it shall be presented and referred without debate. It is a very clear case.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not had an opportunity to examine the petition, which I see is receiving the scrutiny of the President pro tempore of the Senate; but if it is in the form of a petition to Congress, then I quite agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that it ought to be presented through a member of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. That is all of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I then only repeat that a proper request for legislation by a naval officer or by an army officer may very properly be transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War with or without his indorsement.

Mr. HOAR. But not as a petition.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not as a petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not examine the paper particularly. There are quite a number of accompanying papers.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1468) authorizing the consolidation of independent post-offices in the boroughs of Manhattan, Bronx, Richmond, and Queens, New York, with the post-office at New York, N. Y., and making appropriation therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. On a previous day of the session I asked that the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, which was introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], might lie on the table, and that action was taken. I supposed at that time that the bill would more properly be referred to a committee which might be appointed by the Senate; but I have no objection to its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as it came from that committee last year.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that will be done, Mr. President. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, having been read twice, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the flag of the Philippine republic was carried by vessels in the bay of Manila, and whether the flag of the Philippine republic was ever saluted by Admiral Dewey or any of the vessels of his fleet at any time since May 1, 1898. Were Spanish prisoners delivered over to the Philippine forces at the time of the surrender at Subig Bay? Did a vessel commanded by the forces under Aguinaldo, flying the Philippine flag, accompany the vessels Concord and Raleigh back to Subig Bay in June, 1898, in order to compel the surrender of the Spanish forces?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHANDLER. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire objects. The resolution will go over under the rule.

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The resolution was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas the legislature of the State of North Carolina, at its session of 1898, submitted to the people of that State, for ratification or rejection, a proposed amendment to the constitution of said State, as follows:

"Sec. 4. Every person presenting himself for registration shall be able to read and write any section of the Constitution in the English language; and before he shall be entitled to vote shall have paid, on or before the 1st day of March of the year in which he proposes to vote, his poll tax as prescribed by law for the previous year. Poll taxes shall be a lien only on assessed property, and no process shall issue to enforce the collection of the same except against assessed property."

"Sec. 5. No male person who was on January 1, 1867, entitled to vote under the laws of any State in the United States wherein he then resided, and no lineal descendant of any such person, shall be denied the right to register and vote at any election in the State by reason of his failure to possess the educational qualifications prescribed in section 4 of this article: Provided, He shall have registered in accordance with the terms of this section prior to December 1, 1908. The general assembly shall provide for a permanent record of all persons who register under this section on or before November 1, 1908, and all such persons shall be entitled to register and vote at all elections by the people in this State, unless disqualified under section 2 of this article: Provided, Such persons shall have paid their poll taxes as required by law."

And whereas section 5 of the proposed amendment undertakes to confer the right of suffrage on one class of citizens of that State and to exclude another class of citizens from the enjoyment of said privilege;

Resolved, That section 5 of the proposed amendment is in contravention of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and that any State that adopts said provision as a part of its organic law does not possess a republican form of government as contemplated by the Constitution of the United States.

ADDITIONAL PRINT OF BILLS.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, in addition to the usual number, 1,000 copies of each of the following bills: Senate bill 727, to promote the commerce and increase the foreign trade of the United States and to provide auxiliary cruisers, transports, and seamen for Government use when necessary; Senate bill 738, to establish a department of commerce and industries.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. McBRIDE (by request) submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That as the Navy is entitled to nothing less than the best legal ministry, and as the Judge-Advocate-General decides all questions of Constitution, law, and justice for every ship, station, and department in the whole naval service, as well as the many comprehensive matters stated in Congressional Directory as pertaining to said office, inquiry be made if so important a judicial elevation should not be limited to jurists, who, while being versed in naval law and regulations, shall have had at least five years' legal practice, instead of being as now limited (act of June, 1880) to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE. It ought to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is in relation to an officer of the Navy Department.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Committee on Naval Affairs finds that the opinion of the Judiciary Committee on the merits of the resolution is important, of course the Naval Committee will ask for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CŒUR D'ALENE MINING TROUBLES.

Mr. HALE. If there is no further morning business—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a resolution lying on the table which came over from yesterday and which the Chair lays before the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. That resolution, with reference to General Merriam, has been read once. If the Senator from South Dakota will strike out the preamble and accept the following amendment, I have no objection to having it passed—

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will not accept the amendment. I do not know what it is, but I know it is something pernicious, from the source. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CHANDLER. It requires a pernicious Senator to deal with a pernicious proposition.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is the reason why you enlist.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that my amendment be stated, the motion being to strike out in the resolution from the words "by what authority" down to and after the words "the foregoing preamble" and insert what I send to the desk. If that amendment is adopted by the Senate and the preamble stricken out, there will be no objection to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire is speaking with reference to the resolution just laid before the Senate. The resolution has heretofore been read. It went over under objection under the rule, and the Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to hear the resolution read again.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it be read again.

Mr. VEST. I should like to hear the preamble of the resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the resolution as introduced be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the entire resolution, with the preamble.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PETTIGREW, as follows:

Whereas it has become a matter of record in the State of Idaho that Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam, United States Army, together with the governor of Idaho, under date the 8th of May, 1890, officially announced to the mine owners of a portion of the Cœur d'Alene district, in Idaho, that their mines would be closed in case they employed men who belonged to a labor organization known as the Miners' Union; and

Whereas Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam, United States Army, at that time in command of a detachment of United States soldiers at the Cœur d'Alene mines, compelled each miner given employment in said mines to sign a pledge renouncing forever all allegiance to the Miners' Union, and in addition each miner so employed was required to assert that he would never again seek membership in the Miners' Union; and

Whereas Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam, United States Army, through some of his subordinate officers, under the opportunity afforded by a condition of martial law, is charged with brutal treatment of civilian prisoners: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate by what authority Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam, United States Army, performed the acts recited in the foregoing preamble, and also to transmit to the Senate copies of all orders issued by his superiors to the said General Merriam or by the said General Merriam or any of his subordinates, and also copies of all official reports made in connection with the Cœur d'Alene mining troubles during the year 1890.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution by striking out the preamble, and to amend the resolution itself by striking out, in line 1, page 2, after the word "Senate," the words "by what authority Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam, United States Army, performed the acts recited in the foregoing preamble" and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Whether or not Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam, United States Army, has undertaken to close mines in Idaho in case men were there employed who belonged to labor organizations or to compel miners to sign pledges to renounce allegiance to any such organizations, or injuriously treated civilian prisoners.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment which is offered to strike out the preamble will, under the rules, go over until action has been had upon the amendment offered to the resolution itself. So the question before the Senate now is on the amendment offered to the resolution.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the resolution and amendment be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Including the amendment to the preamble?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Including the amendment to the preamble.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can not imagine a resolution more appropriate to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I hope, certainly, that the resolution will not pass in its original form. It says, Whereas General Merriam did this, that, and the other. It remains to be seen whether he did it or not. It gives judgment upon the officer and then wants the Secretary of War to tell why he did it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Personally I have no objection to any reference of the resolution which the Senator from South Dakota wishes to have made; but if he really wants from the Secretary of War the information which the resolution seems to call for, the amendment which I have offered facilitates its purpose. Instead of asking the Secretary of War by what authority General Merriam has done those things, it asks the Secretary of War whether or not he has done the things, and we shall get the information wanted and also the copies of the orders sought by the closing paragraph in the Senator's resolution.

That is a fair and appropriate and orderly method of ascertaining the facts which the Senator says he wants; but to ask the Senate to recite as a fact that General Merriam has done all these things, including brutal treatment of civilian prisoners, instead of asking whether or not he has done them, is something which I imagine the Senate will not do.

Mr. President, the answer which General Merriam himself will make to all these inquiries is contained in his report on the miners' riots in the State of Idaho, which was yesterday ordered to be printed by the Senate, but still it is perfectly proper that this information which the Senator says he wants should be obtained; only, instead of accepting my amendment, to inquire whether or not these things have been done, the Senator now asks to have his resolution and the proposed amendments referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. I have no objection to that course, but it seems to me the simplest method for the Senator would be to endeavor to get the information he has been seeking.

Mr. HAWLEY. I object to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am entirely indifferent as to which committee the resolution goes to. I aim to ascertain who is responsible for a proceeding in Idaho which is a disgrace to civilization. I do not blame the active Senator from New Hampshire for undertaking to avoid the force of these facts. I rather object to his representing the Republican party in doing it, because I do not know whether he is a Republican or not, and I should like to place the responsibility, if it exists, squarely on the Republican party. I am entirely indifferent—

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from South Dakota allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield in a moment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me say a word right here.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield in a moment, but not now.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will not yield now?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not now. I am entirely indifferent as to which committee the resolution goes to. I am entirely willing that the committee shall pursue its own course. It can report the resolution back in any form it chooses, or it can smother it in committee. Either course will be satisfactory to me if it is satisfactory to the committee. There will be no controversy about it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Republican party has its faults, but I have been much more willing to remain a member of it since the Senator from South Dakota left it than I was before.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me?

Mr. CHANDLER. No; not now.

Mr. President, General Merriam has answered all this, but inasmuch as the Senator from South Dakota undertook to recite the fact that General Merriam was charged with brutal treatment of civilian prisoners, and to induce the Senate to pass a resolution asking by what authority he did it, I will read a few words from General Merriam's report bearing upon that point, in justice to the officer and in justice to the War Department. He says that after the arrests were made the men—were placed in a large building, two stories high, which had been constructed and used as a warehouse for storage of hay and grain and other articles by a merchant. It was a good building for the purpose in every way, except that it had no provision for fires and was, of course, without furniture, so that camp fires outside were resorted to and the prisoners were compelled to sleep on the floors, but had an abundant supply of hay to lie upon. The prisoners were also fed at the expense of the State by an experienced caterer, who had managed a large miners' boarding house and had both the necessary means and experience for that purpose.

By daily inspections I satisfied myself that the prisoners were being furnished abundant food and well prepared, although it sometimes unavoidably happened that meals were served later and somewhat irregularly, owing to the large numbers, irregular hours of arrival, and limited facilities for serving. Many of the prisoners were also brought in without blankets, and could not be supplied until bedding was sent or brought to them by their families and friends. It is probable that in this way some of the prisoners were exposed to cold at night and that some of the sickness was due to this exposure, yet the local physician employed by the State for their care informed me that the percentage of sick was far below the average among the same people as a rule.

Without reading further, I may say that General Merriam proceeds to say that with the aid of the governor of the State he went on and wholly relieved all cause of complaint. So the charge that those prisoners were brutally treated is absolutely without any foundation in fact. Now, we can ascertain all the facts if we will ask the Secretary of War in a resolution properly framed; but if the Senator does not want his resolution to pass in that language, I shall move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the resolution, with the amendment offered to it, to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut move to amend by inserting the "Committee on Military Affairs" in place of the "Committee on Education and Labor?"

Mr. HAWLEY. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to make that motion.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it is in order to substitute a different committee, I will make the motion. I did not know that it was.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I said I was indifferent as to the reference of the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it is in order, I move to amend the motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to substitute the "Committee on Military Affairs" in place of the "Committee on Education and Labor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to refer the resolution, with the amendment offered to it, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What shall be done with the preamble?

Mr. HAWLEY. Let it be referred with the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. The preamble should go with the resolution to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued.

Mr. HAWLEY. Permit me to assure the Senator who makes this movement that the Committee on Military Affairs will see that every measure is taken to get full information on the subject.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 12, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 28) relating to the use of the rooms lately occupied by the Congressional Library in the Capitol; and Joint resolution (S. R. 26) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the use of the United States post-office and court-house building at Parkersburg, W. Va., by the circuit court and criminal court of Wood County, W. Va., sitting at Parkersburg.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of the special order, the House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, before that action is taken, permit me to make a statement. It seems quite obvious that it will be impossible for gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, from the number who have applied to me for an opportunity to speak on the pending bill, and I am informed that there are a number of gentlemen on the other side in the same position—that it will not be possible for all of them to be heard during the day-time within the time set apart for the consideration of the bill. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that, beginning with to-night and ending on Friday night, there may be night sessions for debate only, beginning at 8 o'clock and terminating at half past 10 o'clock, under the same order as has been made for the day sessions.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he does not think that a less number of nights would be sufficient. It would seem that one or two night sessions would be all that could be required to accommodate them.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will modify my request, Mr. Speaker, so that the night sessions will begin to-morrow night. That will give us the nights of Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday. I hope the gentleman will not object to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Tennessee, that on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday there shall be night sessions, beginning at 8 o'clock and ending at 10.30, for the purpose of debate only on the pending bill. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would suggest also, Mr. Speaker, also in this same connection, that for five legislative days after the bill is disposed of leave to print be allowed to gentlemen who may desire to submit remarks on the pending bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. After having granted three nights for the discussion of the bill, I think the request for leave to print on the part of all members is just a little unreasonable. Now, if the gentleman will modify his request so that it will apply to the extension of remarks on the part of members who have spoken upon the bill, I certainly would not object to that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will modify the request and ask consent that for five legislative days, after the disposition of the bill, gentlemen who have spoken upon it may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope, if the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee is adopted by the House, that it will be understood to apply to legitimate speeches, and not permit members to print some book or essay on political economy which they may think applicable to the pending question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman from New York is entirely right. I do not want the RECORD to be abused or to be filled up by printing books or financial essays, but only legitimate matter which would probably be used in debate on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the request that those participating in the debate may have five days after the conclusion of the debate in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to suggest, Mr. Speaker, legislative days, because possibly no RECORD will be printed within the five days after the expiration of the time fixed for the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER (continuing). And such printing to be confined to the subject of the special order.

Mr. PAYNE. I think, Mr. Speaker, that these speeches ought to be printed, or ought to be in the hands of the Public Printer, before the holiday recess.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But, Mr. Speaker, if we adjourn the day after the vote is taken on the pending bill there will probably be no RECORD published in which these speeches could be printed.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman's first suggestion is not objectionable—that five days be allowed in which to file these speeches. They can be printed when the first RECORD is published after that date.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But suppose there is no RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. They will appear in the first RECORD published after the disposition of the bill. Five days, I think, instead of five legislative days, would be unobjectionable.

Mr. RICHARDSON. With the understanding that these speeches shall be published in the first RECORD which appears after the five days have expired, I have no objection to that; and my request is that gentlemen who participate in the debate, under the special order, may have until the publication of the RECORD on the first day after the holidays to print such remarks as they desire to make.

Mr. PAYNE. But that is subject to the same objection I have just made. My suggestion is that five days be allowed to file remarks with the Public Printer—five days after the expiration of the special order. The proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee goes right back to the objection which I first suggested, and gives really seventeen days instead of five. We object to that. If you will limit it to five days after the bill is disposed of there will be no objection. I think that is ample time.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is to say, that the speeches must be in the hands of the printer by Saturday of next week. That would be five days from the close of the present special order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, if that is agreeable, I have no objection; but I can see no objection to handing the speeches to the Public Printer up to the date of the publication of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to state to the House what he understands to be the request, which is that those participating in this debate on the floor of the House may have five days from the conclusion of the special order within which to file their remarks with the Public Printer, their remarks to be confined to the discussion of the special order. Is there objection to this request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

And then, in pursuance of the special order, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, with Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I listened with more than ordinary interest yesterday to the opening of this debate. I had curiosity to know what our friends on the other side would say at this late day upon the question which they seem to think is involved in this proposed legislation. I was prepared, with some elaborate knowledge of the arguments that had been made upon the subject of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, but I had witnessed during the past six months such a disintegration of the forces which in 1896 stood by the banner of the great leader of the party who advocated that dogma that I believed—I hoped, at least—that it might be possible that our Democratic friends on the other side of this House would discuss the merits of this legislation and waive, for the present time at least, any distinct advocacy of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1.

I thought that with the breaking up of their party organization in Kansas, the repudiation of their platform by the Democracy of Pennsylvania and Maryland, the significant defeat of their party in the Dakotas, and the evidences coming from all directions in the Northwest and the Southwest that this dogma was no longer a possible issue that would bring victory, that it might be that our Democratic friends would come to us with some other suggestion.

But they are here, and they are here with the same old, stale battle cry, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], with a pertinacity which closely approximates audacity, talks about the victory of 1896 as having been brought about by fraud, by bribery, and by intimidation. The political party that found it necessary to call upon a candidate for President to uphold a Goebel law in Kentucky ought not at this late day to talk about bad legislation and intimidation.

Now, once for all, I want to say to the gentleman that it will not be a valuable declaration in the United States to charge that the Republican party of this country carried the country in 1896 either by corrupting the ballot with money, by intimidation, or by any other means not strictly in keeping with the best and most upright obedience to law.

It is very easy, Mr. Chairman, to stand up and charge a political party with having bribed the voters of the country. It is very easy for a leading and distinguished Democrat to charge that the men of his party are for sale. It is very easy for a distinguished Democrat to say that the voting population of his party have not the courage to vote their sentiments and will sell their votes at an election. But it is not so easy to prove the charge or to convince the people of the facts thus alleged.

I have never had that estimate of the Democratic party myself and I deny that general allegations of that character are worthy of the distinguished position occupied by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]. More than two-thirds of the campaign fund of the Republican party, certainly largely more than half of the national campaign fund of the Republican party of 1896, placed in the hands of its national committee, was expended in the printing and circulation of printed matter among the voters of the country. We entered upon a campaign which bade fair in the outset to be an assault by the Democrats upon the policy of the Republican party in the matter of revenue legislation of Congress, and suddenly we found ourselves precipitated into the fight that ultimately resulted in the election of McKinley. The question of silver suddenly came to the front and assumed a most important place. And so it was that a campaign of education upon a scale unparalleled in the history of political parties in this country was inaugurated by the Republican party and carried through to triumphal victory in the end.

So much for that. Hereafter I trust that our friends on the other side will make deliberate statements of facts, coupled with times, place, and amounts of money, and, as far as possible, the names of Democrats who were hired to vote the Republican ticket, and especially that locations where bribery or intimidation took place be pointed out.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SULZER. Does the gentleman from Ohio know how much money the Republican party expended in 1896?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman from New York know?

Mr. SULZER. I do not know; but I have read the fact stated in the papers that the party expended a very large amount of money.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You never read anything in the papers but what was true, did you?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Do you believe what was in the papers?

Mr. SULZER. I would like to know whether you can answer the question which I asked?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will you answer my question? Do you believe the statements that you read in the newspapers? [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. I would like you to answer my question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman believes what he saw in the papers, he has got the information he seeks; if he does not believe, I am not going to correct a misapprehension of facts.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman can not state it, I am entirely content.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, the gentleman from New York knows that I have occasionally had information that I did not state on this floor. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. I thought, Mr. Chairman, that as the gentleman said that his party had expended two-thirds of this campaign fund in circulating literature he would know how much money they had.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, "the gentleman from Ohio" does know to a dollar, and "the gentleman from Ohio" remits the gentleman from New York to such sources of information as he may value.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to proceed. There has been a great deal said here, and some of it is exceedingly interesting, about the change that the Republican party in this country has made upon the question involved, and I have understood, if I do not misapprehend, that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] claimed that this question of the gold standard in the United States had never yet been submitted to the voters of the country.

I so understood him—that this was a new thing; nobody had asked for it; nobody had called upon the Republicans in Congress to pass any measure of this character. If I am right about that, I want to say that the gentleman is wholly and absolutely mistaken in his statement. I hold in my hands a pamphlet containing a complete illustration of what took place at St. Louis nearly four years ago, when the Republican party met and established the platform upon which the campaign of 1896 was fought out; and I undertake to say, from the various propositions that were there submitted, this statement is a true statement. There were no differences of opinion that were material between the various leading Republicans when assembled at St. Louis upon the question of what the platform should be upon the subject of the currency.

I hold in my hands a poll of the members of the committee on resolutions, made before they had assembled, and which gives the individual opinions of every member of that great committee. If any gentleman will take the trouble to read it—and I shall place it in my remarks—he will discover that an overwhelming majority of that committee were in favor, even prior to their assembling at St. Louis, of putting into the platform a declaration in favor of the gold standard, and that the only controversy that arose at St. Louis, or has ever arisen since that time among Republicans, has been the question of who favored certain wording, certain expressions, certain mere verbiage in the platform; but so it was that finally, under the guidance of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, Senator FORAKER, who had in his possession all the propositions that had been made, two or three of which are accredited to myself and one or more to the distinguished Speaker of this House, out of all these propositions was molded the platform about which there was no dispute and which advocated a declaration by the Republican party in favor of the gold standard—"the existing gold standard"—and under that battle cry we won the great victory, and from that day to this there has been no word of contention among the Republicans of this country.

The known opinions of the gentlemen who constituted the committee on resolutions of the convention before their first meeting are shown in the following poll:

Now, who cares about going back into ancient history to find how parties of this country have stood upon this question? I said when this rule was under consideration that our friends on the other side would have enough to do to hold themselves together in opposition to this bill without discussing anything or to analyze their position, and if they saw fit to discuss our antecedent history it was all right. I am going to put into the RECORD Democratic declarations upon a certain series of questions, and point out to you what sort of a record you have, and after you have disposed of that you can come back at us about consistency in politics. Why, when the war for the suppression of the rebellion was going on every leading, distinguished Democrat of the United States denounced these greenbacks that my friend from Missouri almost shed tears over yesterday. It was really painful to me, with my sympathetic nature, to hear him talk about the bare possibility of impounding a few of the greenbacks—that very mode of money, that very proposition that the Democratic party in Congress and throughout the country, in the years 1862 to 1865, denounced as worthless rags and sent word to the soldiers in the army not to take that money, for it was utterly worthless. The same Democratic party three years later, in 1868, in New York, nominated Horatio Seymour on a platform in favor of irredeemable greenbacks without any prospect or provision that they should ever be redeemed—a socialistic, Populistic, hoboistic proposition from beginning to end. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. For what purpose?

Mr. TERRY. Does not the gentleman think it would be a little nearer recent history if, instead of going back to the attitude of the Democratic party in 1861, he would refer to the attitude of the Republican party in regard to greenbacks in the years 1892, 1893, 1894, and 1895?

Mr. GROSVENOR. My friend from Arkansas has a mind that always outstrips mine in the race. He always gets ahead of me.

Mr. TERRY. That is a pretty hard thing to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman from Arkansas think I would talk about 1868 and omit the gems of political literature involving the Democratic platforms of more recent date?

Mr. TERRY. I said the Republican platform.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the Republican platform also. I will give the gentleman the platforms of 1892 of both parties now, and he will find little to console him upon this question. The Democratic platform of that year, on which Cleveland ran for office, has the following:

We denounce the Republican legislation, known as the Sherman Act, of 1890 as a cowardly makeshift, fraught with possibilities of danger in the future, which should make all of its supporters, as well as its author, anxious for its speedy repeal. We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage, but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and unchangeable value.

Then the Democratic party stood where the Republican party stood exactly in that year 1892. They elected a President who came into this House and asked the members of this House to justify and authorize the borrowing of money at 3 per cent interest upon gold bonds, and I shall speak about that later on. I shall print in my remarks some of these various declarations of the different parties; and while I am ready to confess that conditions have changed since these declarations, I maintain that the Republican party has always held to the single cardinal doctrine that every dollar of our money shall be of equal intrinsic value, and that every dollar shall have the equal debt-paying power in the country. It has always stood by the bondholder and the laborer alike. It has always declared that the man who drew his pension and the man who drew his pay for a day's labor and the man who cuts his coupons off the bonds shall be paid in a dollar of equal value. The whole legislation of the Republican party from 1892 down to now has been right along that line.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN], whom I always like to hear talk, for I have found him to be clear and explicit in his views, made a most singular statement yesterday, and I desire to refer to it. He stated that if we now proceed to legislate and enact a law that shall make all the bonds of the Government payable in gold in the terms of the law itself then we shall advance the premium upon all the outstanding bonds of the country way up to an enormous and most fabulous price.

He talked about a 4 per cent bond being $1.75, or something like that, on the dollar—a thing never heard of except in the dreams of Democratic statesmen when they have been trying to palm off a 50-cent dollar on the laboring people of the United States. Let me call my young friend's attention to the difficulty under which he labors. He does not undertake to give this as his opinion, based upon his own knowledge of financial matters, but he goes back to 1893 or 1895 and takes up the fact that Cleveland proposed a bond issue for sixty-two millions—it was not fifty millions, as my friend thinks—a gold bond at 3 per cent interest, or a coin bond at 4 per cent, and then he figures out the difference there would have been at that time under that state of the bonds and the time the issue was paid, and undertakes to convince the people of this country that our bill now pending would have the same effect on the whole issue of the Government bonds now outstanding that operated and effected the offers made for the purchase of those bonds.

The gentleman has misinterpreted the difference between these two bonds at that period of time. The 3 per cent gold bond was an anomaly in our legislation, and had we passed that bill, which the Democratic Congress voted almost solidly for, the effect of it would have been this—as I understood at the time, and as I understand now: we should have segregated that $62,500,000 of that loan out from the great mass of the bonded indebtedness of the country and we should have imported into the terms of the bond the word "gold," whereas all the other bonded indebtedness of the country was payable, by the terms of the bonds, in "coin."

Now, the effect, Mr. Chairman, would have been at once to call attention of the financial world to the fact that Congress was using language in the enactment of the law that imported a discrimination between the various classes of bonds. You could not hold the legislation of Congress as of no force and effect. You could consider the word "coin," as used in one part of the declaration, and "gold," as used in another, as meaning precisely the same thing, when the word "gold" is used in the one sense and the word "coin" in a very different sense. So the first impression was that the coin bonds would be payable in the silver dollar of the country; that is unmistakable; and the effect would have been to place the bonds that had "gold" inserted in them upon a higher plane and fix them at a higher value than the other bonds.

I remember very well the circumstances connected with the legislation to which gentlemen have referred. Gentlemen have talked of Senator Sherman and his connection with the issue of these bonds. They have suggested what he said as to the purpose of the law. They have stated what his understanding was as to the purpose of the insertion of the word "gold" into the bonds then issued. I remember very well the vote upon that occasion. I remember the action taken by my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], then leading the majority of the Republican side on that question, and in opposition to the insertion of the word "gold" in the bonds, and I acted with him. It was argued here that it made a difference between the coin and the gold bonds of some $16,000,000 to the Government in the long run of the series.

I had an interview with Senator Sherman on the subject. I said to him, "This charge has been made, and by my vote, it is said, I have undertaken to increase the cost to the Government, according to the statement which has been urged, of some $16,000,000." He took a pencil and made a rapid calculation. He said, "That is entirely correct. It will cost the Government to redeem the bonds you authorize $16,000,000 more than if you had authorized gold bonds." I thought I was going to get a lecture from him for my vote on that question, but he said, "There is another view which should be taken of this matter. If you put the word 'gold' into the bonds you issued, you would have made a suggestion to the people of the United States that all the other bonds already issued were payable in silver, and thereupon you would have depreciated the outstanding bonds four times $16,000,000." That was the argument that was made at that time by the financiers of the day, and that is the argument that is just as true now.

Now let us recur again to the argument of the gentleman from New York. We do not insert the word "gold" into the new issue of bonds, but we do put into the law affecting them a provision which must meet the approval and sanction of both branches of the Government. We provide that all of the bonds of the Government and all of the obligations of the Government shall be payable in gold, and when we do that we do not advance the value of the outstanding bonds or increase the indebtedness of the Government to the extent of a single copper.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] said that we are making a new departure for the Government, and so said the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN]. The gentleman from Missouri says we are making the Government a largely increased debtor; that we are making a gift to the people of the difference between the gold and the coin bond. That statement, however, has no force whatever, unless the gentleman proposes that it is the purpose of himself and his party to pay the outstanding bonds of the Government in a money that is worth less than gold. Does he propose that? Does the gentleman propose to carry out the argument and the scheme to cut down the value of the bonds of the Government below par in gold? If so, there is some sense in his argument. If not, it is simply "sound and fury, signifying nothing."

But now let us get back to the changes of opinion which have come upon us in the last few years. I was once assailed on the floor of the House for an alleged change of opinion, and following the example of my able and distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], I will give a personal illustration. My attention was called to a vote that I gave in the legislature of the State of Ohio, and I am glad to be able to state my exact position in regard to it. I was a member of the legislature of that State in 1875, and from that time to 1879, during four years, and from 1876 to 1877 I was a member of the house of representatives and was the speaker of that body. There was introduced in the senate a proposition advocating the passage of the Bland-Allison Act. At that time the difference between the gold and silver in the dollar was something like from 3 to 5 cents—not more than 5 and not less than 3. We were approaching then the resumption period and the law was to take effect on the 1st day of January, 1879.

All this country was in doubt, except a very few financiers. There was terror everywhere lest we should go to protest, and a leading Democrat of Ohio, a most distinguished Democrat, in his speeches in the fall of that year, said that when the subtreasury in New York should be opened on the 1st day of January it would require the standing Army to protect the Treasury from the rush that would be made to cash in the greenback dollars and the demands upon the Treasury. And so, believing as I did then, that the passage of the Bland-Allison Act, or its equivalent, whatever the form was, would be a relief to the Treasury and aid it in resumption, and the difference between the intrinsic value of the metals being so small, I voted in favor of that resolution, as did everybody else almost in both branches of the Ohio legislature. And, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen need not turn to me and point me out as an example of changing front. If conditions to-day were where they were then, I would now vote for the same measure that I voted for in 1877.

Other gentlemen have grown wiser as well as I have, and step by step we have seen the ruin that any other course than the one now proposed will always bring upon the country; and so we are admonished by the people of the country to stand for the measure now under consideration.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] talks about the Republican party being under the domination of the wealthy classes, and undertakes to point out that we do nothing here that is favorable to what he is pleased to call "the masses." Why, if there is any one party on the face of this continent that more nearly represents the aspirations, the hopes and the interests of the masses of the people of this country, surely it is the Republican party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Let us see what has happened. I am not going back now, my friend from Arkansas will take notice, into ancient history. I will come down to some modern history. Three years ago last summer we had a great contest in the United States. People talk about the days of Henry Clay, of Daniel Webster, and the great men of those periods. I have read the history of the politics of my country, and I say without hesitation that the greatest battle of intellect, of brains, of education, the greatest battle ever fought in the arena of American politics, was the battle of 1896. More study was given to politics that year than ever before. More earnest attention was given to the real questions involved that year than in any other year, and the greatness, the power, the eloquence, the learning were not all on one side. I frankly admit it. I was there and I heard the contest. I heard the clash of arms. I witnessed the charging columns upon the battlefield, and I testify without hesitation that it was a battle of giants and it was a battle for principle and not for spoils.

How came it and what was there of it? The summer of 1896 came upon the people of the United States finding them in the worst condition they were ever in in all the history of the country.

There was more poverty, more starvation, more uncertainty, more bankruptcy, than on any previous occasion in the history of our country. I know that Professor Fiske, ignoring the present, tells us that the most terrible days of our country were in the years that followed the close of the Revolutionary war. Those troubles were ephemeral and small in comparison with the horrors which presented themselves to the people of the United States in the year 1896. And they were all the worse because we had just emerged from a period of magnificent prosperity.

The year 1893 dawned upon us with the greatest prosperity the country had ever had up to that date, but from the very introduction of the year 1893 down to the close of 1896 horrors accumulated upon every hand and trod upon each other's heels, so swift they came. There were more idle men in this country than ever before. There were more soup houses than ever before. The one great industry that has always flourished under the Democratic party, the American soup house, was in a more flourishing condition than ever known before on earth. Our foreign trade had been diminished. Our mills and factories stood idle. Everybody agreed to it. Go back to your own speeches on the floor of this House in the summer of 1896, gentlemen, prior to the two conventions, and you agreed with us and we agreed with you that the times were troublous, that the oppression of the people was horrible, and that something had to be done; and you went to Chicago and we went to St. Louis to tell the people of this country what we proposed to do, you admitting all that we claimed and we admitting all that you claimed.

You said the panacea was this, the free and unlimited coinage of silver and the maintenance of the free-trade tariff bill called the Wilson Act. That is what you said. You said, "Give us those two things." One was a negative proposition—"We will not repeal this law." The other was an affirmative proposition—"We will pass the free-silver law." And you said—and there is the mistake you made; there is where you put all your eggs in one basket—you said, "If you do not have free silver you will never have any better times." You said throughout this country that a vote for McKinley meant 10-cent corn, 25-cent wheat, 3-cent cotton, and all the various horrors that were coming rapidly upon us; and your great candidate for the Presidency said to the starving laborers, "Your wages will never be increased in this country until you have the free coinage of silver." He said to the farmers, who were selling their wheat at 45 cents a bushel, "You will never get any more for your wheat until we have the free coinage of silver." He said, "The volume of the currency is so small that business can not be transacted upon it, and it will never be any better until you have the free coinage of silver."

That was the issue, as they said. What did we say? We said the question of the coinage of silver had nothing to do with it. We said the trouble came of sending our money to pay for the articles that we consumed among the American people to foreign lands, and expending our money to pay for labor in the old countries. And we said, "Give us back the McKinley law, or its equivalent, and we will stand upon 'the existing gold standard,' and good times will come." [Applause on the Republican side.] That was the issue, gentlemen. You know it; you know it as well as I do. I have exaggerated nothing; I have not dotted an "i" nor crossed a "t" that was not all previously in your argument to the people of this country.

The campaign went on; the battle was fought; it was a battle of education; it was a battle that brought into action every prominent man in the United States, and the issue was as clearly made as it was possible. Looking back to that period, I have only to regret that during the latter days of that great campaign there was practically a substantial silence by the great leader of the Democracy upon the real question of the free coinage of silver; and as the desperation of the closing hours began to come he came into the laboring districts of the great middle North and West and appealed to the laboring men and the poor men, the suffering men of that community, in a way that nothing but the heat of a Presidential campaign and the desperation of his own position would have justified.

He came into my own district. The miners of that district were suffering for bread. They were mining coal about two and a half days a week at 45 cents a ton, and he appealed to them against the men of money. And, Mr. Chairman, there never was an hour in the history of this country when we were in greater peril—when it was doubtful whether he would be elected or not. I rode during the latter days of the campaign among the miners of my district and heard the muttering of voices that I hope I will never hear again in my life.

Men who were hungry, men who were looking forward to the coming of a cold and desolate winter without the prospect of any improvement of the conditions, men who had heard the unfortunate voice of this great leader rallying them against the men of money, men who had something, men who are the leaders of the business interests of the country; but they did not falter. And I shall never forget the impression that was made upon me as I rode upon a special train for miles on three days before the election, with decorated cars, to let the people know that it was a campaign movement; and I saw in front of the little cabins of the coal miners here and there, very often on the great majority of them, a little flag, a little American flag, that typified the faith of that miner in that great party that had always upheld that flag and the interests of labor [loud applause on the Republican side]; and it was both pitiful and beautiful, as we swung past them, to see the little children coming out, almost naked, almost starving, and pointing to the flag upon their little cabins.

The election came, and the faith of the people swung over to the Republican party, answering every call to duty, and elected McKinley and a Republican Congress. [Loud applause.] He who to-day undertakes to say that that was not the voice of the American people is deaf to a sound that has convinced the intelligence of this country. What happened? Prosperity came. It did not come very fast. We assembled here on the 15th day of March. We passed a tariff bill, under the pledge of the Republican party made by Mr. McKinley to the people of this country when standing upon the porch of his little house, as was described so eloquently by the gentleman from Iowa. He declared that there was but one thing to do, and that was to pass a tariff law.

We came here in obedience to his pledge, and in answer to that call, on the 31st day of March, we passed the Dingley bill. It was delayed and impeded in the Senate, and became law on the 24th of July. Great reactions in business come slowly, and our Democratic friends caught the hope that the horrors that they created were still to last and hang over us. I do not want to say anything unpleasant, and am not going to; but it is a very curious thing to me that I never saw a happy Democrat when he could not complain of something. [Laughter.] I never saw a happy Democrat when he could not pick out somebody that was unhappy.

Why, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] has not really waked up to the fact that we have prosperity in this country, and his great leader, the champion of the Democratic party, went about the country lecturing for a year and a half, inquiring as he came into the towns and villages, "Where is the advance agent of prosperity?" and my friend from Iowa did not sleep regularly for six months under the demands of the Democratic party to make good his proposition that Mr. McKinley was "the advance agent of prosperity." But it came. The farmers of Kansas in a single year paid off and canceled $65,000,000 of mortgages that used to be wailed about on the floor of the House.

The following extract from a recent news publication shows how labor has been benefited:

MEANS MILLIONS TO EMPLOYEES—INCREASE IN MAINE AND NEW HAMPSHIRE MILLS.

MANCHESTER, N. H., December 7, 1899.

Following the announcement from Boston yesterday that wages at the Ameskeag, Stark, and Amory cotton mills here are to be advanced 10 per cent December 18, Agent Charles D. McDuffie, of the Manchester company, has declared that his mills also will grant an increase of 10 per cent on December 18. In all, nearly 15,000 hands are affected by the new schedule here. The pay rolls of the mills in Massachusetts aggregate $112,000 a week. The new rates mean an increase of nearly $300,000 a year in wages.

LEWISTON, ME., December 7, 1899.

The mills of this State will grant the general increase in wages now being arranged in cotton-manufacturing towns of New England.

Notices of a 10 per cent advance are being posted gradually through the cotton districts of Maine. To-day the Androscoggin, Continental, Bates, and Hill mills, of Lewiston, announce an increase of 10 per cent to begin December 18. About 5,000 hands are employed by the four corporations.

The Baker mills, of Auburn; Farwell mills, of Lisbon, and other concerns will take some action on the question shortly. The York corporation, of Saco, will raise wages Monday. The Lockwood Mills, of Waterville, have announced a 10 per cent increase for December 18. The Laconia and Pepper manufacturing companies will increase the pay of their 3,000 employees 10 per cent December 10.

And the following:

In addition to the foregoing mills, other operators have signified their intention to soon raise the scale.

The payment of the mortgages upon farm lands in Kansas is in keeping with the record everywhere. But in Kansas they knocked out the whole argument, so far as that was concerned, and the people of Kansas not only knocked out the mortgages, but they knocked out the Populist representatives in Congress with the sole exception of one. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, my friends, I am going to make a few concise interrogatories. Can you name one thing you said after your introductory remarks of "Ladies and gentlemen" or "Fellow citizens" in any one of your campaign speeches of 1896 that ever became true? [Laughter on the Republican side.] Can you? If you can, I appeal to you, under this order to print, to put it into the RECORD and let us embalm it.

Was there one thing you said—and you may start at Bryan and go clear down to the smallest Democrat or go up to the largest Democrat, and you may take all the newspapers and all your arguments, and if you will find one single suggestion, either affirmative or negative, that came out as you said, I will agree that I never heard of it up to this time. Can you name it? You can not. Do you want the people now to take your word that you understand this question that is now pending here? Do you?

Suppose one of you were a witness on the witness stand and a competent cross-examiner questioned your fitness as an expert. On cross examination he would say, "My friend, you have been in politics for a long time?" "Yes." "You were in the campaign of 1896, were you not?" "Yes." "You made speeches and wrote letters and talked to the people?" "Yes." "Please find one thing, and bring it to me, which you then said that was not false when you said it or was a mistake of fact." I think you would be ordered to stand aside by the court, who would be the judge of your competency as a witness. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

You said we would have no foreign trade. We have had the biggest foreign trade this country ever had in all its history. You said we would not have money enough to do business. We have $400,000,000 more to-day than when you made that prophetic utterance, and every dollar is of equal par value. But we are here to say that no contingency shall ever arise, if we can help it, when you shall undo the work the people demand shall be done. [Applause on the Republican side.] You are in favor of the free coinage of silver, are you? The most disastrous agitation that ever came into this country. Under it in 1896 the cash value of property in this country had decreased more than the whole cost of the civil war, the war with Spain, and the war with Aguinaldo and the Philippine Islands.

And what do you expect to gain by it? Thank the Lord, who has so long stood with us, you can not undo the demands of the American people for eight years unless death intervenes to bring about the results. The Senate of the United States is arranged by some decree of Providence or the wisdom of man, or both acting jointly, in such a condition that you have no hope for the free coinage of silver for at least eight years to come. Now, are you willing to agitate the people of this country again? Are you willing to unsettle values, are you willing to again threaten the people of this country with the devastation you brought upon the business of the country before?

Now, one or two more questions. If I am wrong, tell me. What caused the good times of 1892? I refer you to the commercial reports of December of that year and I refer you to the President's message of December, 1892. What brought it about? Answer that. It came right in at the very feet of this great crime of 1873. We made greater progress than we had made in the same number of years before. What brought it about? Was it your wisdom or ours? There was not a statute on the statute books of the country which you had put there. There was not one there that effected the results that we did not put there.

Answer me the next question. What caused the country to go from that condition in business down into the terrible condition that we found ourselves in 1896? Explain it, my friends. Tell it so we can understand it; but let me give you a warning as to one thing—you may work out a theory of your own to explain how hard times came, you may talk about the Sherman law and other things of that character—but let me warn you that if you do that my next question you can not answer in consonance with my third question. My next question is this: If that be true, what caused the reaction of 1897? What was it that brought to this country a condition of prosperity the like of which no people on earth ever had before? Tell me that; and tell me why it is that every time the Democratic party gets into power we go down in the scale of prosperity, and every time the Republican party comes back into power we get up again. Go back to 1837, and come on down, and the record is all alike and uniform.

Let us be practical about these things. Let us consider them in a common-sense light. Let us get down to the business itself, and not take the theories of the advocates of the free and unlimited coinage of silver as a basis on which to act. Such theories are obsolete; they are not in consonance with the ideas of the times; but we can deal with the question in a common-sense way. Let us not deal with it in the light that sends a cold chill down the backs of millions of Democrats in the country when you say that you are going to nominate Bryan, on the Chicago platform, and make him and that platform the standard of your party. [Applause and laughter on Republican side.] Is it not wise, is it not common sense? Then come to the front and let us discuss these things in a reasonable way.

Let us consider the question as to what is the matter with the country, what was the matter with it in times past, and who rescued it from the dangers which threatened it. Who gave labor to the laborers of the country; who abolished and closed the soup houses; who scattered the charitable institutions and made their operation no longer necessary, and who gave credit to the Government obligation throughout the entire world? Tell me all of these things candidly and honestly, and then it will be time to talk of "trusts and combines" until you are tired.

Before closing this particular part of my remarks I want to say that I shall have a word to say myself on the subject of trusts. I incorporate into my remarks at this point three sections of the Sherman law of 1890. These were passed by a Republican House, passed by a Republican Senate, and approved by a Republican President.

They are as follows:

SECTION 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce in any Territory of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or in restraint of trade or commerce between any such Territory and another, or between any such Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, is hereby declared illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishment, in the discretion of the court.

There is one thing that you will not overlook in the consideration of the matter, that every time a Democratic Administration was in force opportunity was given for the creation of these organizations, but on the incoming of a Republican Administration the tendency was to break up and curtail the strength of the trusts in this country.

I wish some gentleman on the other side of the House, between now and Friday night, when this debate is to close, would be kind enough, after reading the three sections of the law to which I have just referred and alluding to the criminal character of the trusts and combines of the country, to discuss them in the light of the decision of the Supreme Court, and to state what, in his judgment, could be added to the legislation adopted by the Republican party in this connection. Just put it in plain words. Do not stand up and attack trusts or attack members on this side of the House for the law which has been enacted. You never had anything to do with the passage of the law or the enforcement of it. It is a Republican law, passed by a Republican Congress, and enforced by them. Tell me now what you would add to it. If there are objections to the law, let us know what they are. Come right out—and that is a sensible way to deal with the matter—and say what you would, in the line of words, add to make it more far-reaching, more sweeping or effective than it is to-day. If you can add to the effectiveness of that law or strengthen it in any way, I should be very glad to have a suggestion to that extent.

Mr. Chairman, I should not undertake to carry out the suggestions of Mr. Bryan and his supporters, that Congress shall be authorized to legalize or destroy absolutely the corporations of this country in the different States of the Union. I believe in leaving to the States themselves the power to create and limit the operations of corporations, and I believe the suggestion that carries with it the limitation by Congress of the power of the States in this regard unwise and unstatesmanlike. A proposition that would curtail the power of the States themselves in the management of their local affairs, it seems to me, should shock every man and every intelligent American politician. I have said heretofore that I was a better Democrat than many of those who occupy seats upon the other side and who talk of Democratic principles in that regard. I do not believe in a recognition of power which would authorize the General Government to go into the States and undertake to interfere with domestic affairs or with domestic traffic and to say that such and such commodities shall not cross the line of the States, or which should undertake to limit or destroy the powers of State corporations.

But I do not propose at this time to discuss that question. There is another point to which I wish to attract the attention of the committee.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield for a question.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman if the decision of the courts in the last thirty years have not entirely changed the legal aspect of the interstate-commerce law? In other words, has not the doctrine, in a certain way, deprived the States of the very power the gentleman is now discussing?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, now, that opens quite a wide field. Would that be a justification why Congress should now undertake to assail the corporations of a State by legislation? I admit that there has been all over this country, in the State courts and in the Supreme Court of the United States, a growth of judicial interpretation. I admit that. The gentleman is a lawyer and he knows I am right, and he knows that there is no great State of the Union that can say that this system of legal interpretation has not invaded the supreme authority of his own State. I admit that, but that is no reason why we should to-day undertake by Congressional action, to destroy the power of the States to control and regulate their own domestic affairs in their own way. The States must finish the work so auspiciously begun by Congress and the Supreme Court.

Mr. Chairman, the Republican party of the United States does not need oral argument in the halls of Congress nor dissertations in the press of the country upon these vital questions. There are voices which proclaim the triumph of Republicanism that do not depend upon human organs for their effectiveness. From the pine-clad hills of Maine to the utmost southern extent of New England the whirl of the spindle, the ring of the hammer, and the shout of happy, well-paid operatives are a constant and most vociferous proclamation of Republican triumph. From New York to San Francisco, all along the mighty avenues of travel and traffic, the voices of commendation and exultation because of Republican legislation and Republican intelligence and Republican statesmanship go up in the breezes of the morning and are sung as vespers at the hour of evening twilight.

The mighty volumes of flame and smoke pouring from the chimneys of enormous industrial establishments wave a beacon light to heaven announcing the triumph of protective tariff and sound money. Mingled with the click of the pick in the coal measures of Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana, and West Virginia is the voice of our workmen, well paid where starvation wages were in force, well fed where starvation stalked with gaunt horror, well clothed, well educated, satisfied, contented, happy. Their voices sing praise for Republican intelligence and Republican patriotism, mingled with the fall of the coal measures and the ring of the implements of industry.

On every railroad line from the Pacific shore to the Atlantic coast tens of thousands of laden cars mingle the voice of machinery with the indorsement of Republican action. The happy husbandman, upon millions of acres of fertile soil, as he returns from his labor bringing his sheaves with him, realizes in an advancing market wider demands for his product, the entering of a jubilee, and his voice is heard in perpetual argument in favor of sound money and protection.

The scratch of the pen upon the record in the Northwest and the Southwest as it cancels the millions of mortgages placed there in the hour of Democratic distress and starvation now canceled by the payment of money that has come to the owners of these splendid farms through the intelligence and patriotism of Republican administration joins in the grand cry of indorsement all along the line. As in the olden time the morning stars sang together for joy, and all the sons of God rejoiced, so from Maine to California, from the North to the South, from the East to the West, the sons of toil, the sons of business, the sons of America join in the glad shout that drowns the feeble voice of partisan speculation and partisan denunciation in the grand, glorious, ringing chorus of a redeemed and happy nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] is recognized for forty minutes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I have been much entertained by the felicitations in which the gentleman who has just closed [Mr. GROSVENOR] has indulged regarding the increased prosperity of the times; felicitations in which I join; felicitations in which every member on this side of the House joins. We all admit that times are better; that the prices of many products and classes of property have risen; that the mills are open; that our railway trains are carrying increased quantities of freight and increased numbers of passengers; that there is a favorable trade balance which during the past two years has increased to almost phenomenal proportions. All these evidences of increased prosperity we hail with the utmost satisfaction, but we claim that they constitute a vindication of the theory of bimetalists that prices largely depend upon the quantity of money in circulation, and that, all other things being equal, the contraction of the money volume means falling prices, and an enlargement of the money volume means rising prices, and that as population and business increase a proportionate increase in the quantity of money is required in order to maintain stable prices and prevent falling prices.

We claim it is the duty of the Government to authorize the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver as they come from the gold and silver mines, the ancient and accustomed sources of money, and that if these, aided by the employment of the various credit agencies devised by man, are not sufficient to meet the requirements of exchanges and the maintenance of prices, the Government should issue legal tender paper money in quantity sufficient for such purposes, and we claim that the existing prosperity, so welcome after a long period of depression, though coincident with the present Administration, has not been caused by it, but by the responsiveness of nature to the eager and pressing demands of man, who, denied by unwise legislation the accustomed utilization of the silver product of the mines has pressed inquiry and investigation in the remote parts of the world for the gold which alone is given monetary efficiency.

We claim that the enlarged production of gold recently experienced has, in a measure, met the demands of the quantitative theory of money, and has saved us from the ruin with which the monometallic policy threatened us. The Republican party has not saved us from destruction; nature itself has reached out an availing hand and placed within the reach of man an unexpected supply of gold, such as has never before been realized. No bimetalist ever claimed or contended that there was any virtue in the quality of money. We all insisted that the quantity of money, that the volume of money, must be maintained; that it must be enlarged proportionately to the increase of population and business, and the vindication of our theory rests in existing conditions; for the annual product of gold to-day is nearly three times as great as it was in 1873, when the process of demonetizing silver was commenced, and it was that increase in the product of gold, which means an increase in the quantity of money throughout the world, which has saved us from the policy of contraction which the Republicans inaugurated in 1873 and completed in 1893 by the repeal of the Sherman Act, and propose to make more efficient now by the measure pending before this body.

THE PANIC OF 1873.

Recollect that, in 1873, and for years prior thereto, the product of gold had been constantly diminishing. Nature, as if intending to fill the vacuum caused by the diminution of gold, let out an increased supply of silver, and the contention of the gentlemen on the other side was that, whilst gold was diminishing and silver was increasing in quantity, we should limit the coinage of new money entirely to the metal which was diminishing in quantity and deny monetary use to the metal which was increasing in quantity; and so in this country, at the close of a destructive war, when twelve millions of people had been practically added to our population by the capitulation of Lee, people whose only currency was Confederate paper, whose efficiency as a medium of exchange was entirely destroyed by the result of the war, we started upon a policy of contraction and commenced the retirement of the greenbacks and denied coinage to the silver product from our mines.

And so from 1873 until 1878, when the use of silver was partially restored under the Bland Act, and the volume moderately increased, the most disastrous contraction took place, sweeping away the fortunes of thousands and hundreds of thousands, transferring the wealth from the debtors to the creditors, changing mortgages into deeds, and accomplishing the greatest centralization of wealth known up to that time in the history of the country, and only to be surpassed by the enormous concentration of wealth caused by the recent depression.

Our gold friends insist that the resumption of specie payments was the cause of the improved conditions following 1878. We claim that these improved conditions were caused by the increase of money through the Bland Act, an increase which stayed the fall of prices, but which later on, as business, population, and exchanges increased, was insufficient to maintain stable prices. And then came the Sherman Act of 1890, which, though imperfect in its construction as judged by the rules of monetary science, steadied somewhat the fall of prices until its repeal, checking the output of new money, brought on the disastrous depression of 1893 and subsequent years.

THE PANIC OF 1893.

Let us trace the history of the country through the period of depression commencing in 1893. The panic of that year was not caused by the coinage of silver under the Sherman Act.

There were two causes for this panic. One was the constantly diminishing price which this country was receiving from the export of its farm products, the price of these products being largely determined by the prices in silver countries, whose exports were stimulated by the low price of silver. Another cause was the failure of the McKinley Act to meet the expectations of its framers as a revenue producer. The free admission of sugar took away a large annual revenue for which no sufficient substitute was offered by the McKinley bill, and the bill which was intended to cure the evils of a surplus revenue presented all the disadvantages of a deficit revenue.

The surplus in the Treasury was gradually exhausted, and toward the close of Harrison's Administration an issue of bonds was seriously considered. The country therefore was drained in two ways: The national Treasury was drained of its accumulation by a deficit-producing revenue bill, and the country was drained by an adverse balance of trade owing to the fact that its agricultural products had been lessened in their debt-paying capacity. Accompanying this came a demand for gold in Austria, and the greenbacks and Treasury notes were used by foreign financiers as a means of drawing out the gold required for the Austrian treasury.

Mr. Cleveland, aided by the banks and the metropolitan press, took advantage of the situation to raise the false cry that the Sherman Act was the cause of existing conditions, and the banks themselves, in their keen desire to stop the coinage of silver, created a clamor which, in turn, caused a run upon the banks. The withdrawal of deposits and the constant diminution of bank credits was a natural result. The Cleveland Administration having come into power, its first act was to repeal the Sherman Act, and the second was to pass the Wilson tariff bill. No more unfavorable time could have been taken for the lowering of the tariff wall. The very purpose of this act was to let more foreign goods in; every foreign product which was admitted displaced so much American labor, and thus a readjustment of the labor question throughout the country was forced.

The country during Cleveland's Administration was subjected to two great disturbances—one financial, by cutting off the increase of money throughout the United States by the repeal of the Sherman Act, when more money was needed; the other was industrial, involving the lowering of the tariff wall and a proportional substitution in our own markets of foreign products for products produced by the labor of our own people. During all this time confident predictions were made of an immediate advance in prosperity, to be caused by increased confidence. None of these predictions were realized, and the Republican party came into power upon the promise of a protective tariff measure and of an increased volume of money to be secured by free coinage of silver through international agreement.

As soon as a Republican victory was announced it was declared that confidence was restored and that the wheels of industry would immediately move. The whistles of the factories throughout the country heralded the coming of renewed prosperity and activity, but Congress met in the following March without the realization of this confident prediction. It was then insisted that as soon as the protective tariff bill was passed the wheels would move, and so the Dingley bill was framed and allowed to take its course unobstructed by the opposition, and even aided by the friends of silver. The bill passed, and again the factory whistles were sounded, but the wheels did not move, and Congress adjourned later on without any material improvement in the condition of the country. I can recall the gloomy countenances of my Republican friends at that time. Their predictions had not been realized; the wheels had not commenced to move—discouragement and prostration everywhere.

SHORT CROPS ABROAD.

It was not until after Congress adjourned that the change took place. The cause of it was the great demand for our agricultural products, caused by short crops elsewhere, the result being a favorable balance, which brought within a few months many million dollars of gold to us. This was followed by large exports of manufactured goods, mainly produced by the very trusts now complained of, and which constitute so serious a menace to individual enterprise as well as to the compensation of labor. The gold trust produced the industrial trusts.

The cause for their organization was falling prices and the necessity of cheaper production, and so the various industries were combined; improved machinery was secured; middlemen were dispensed with; clerks, salesmen, and officials were consolidated, and the result was a cheapened production which sought the markets of foreign countries. Thus the great demand for our agricultural as well as our manufactured products brought to this country within three years very nearly $300,000,000 in gold, and the increase in prosperity can be directly traced, not to the repeal of the Sherman Act, not to the passage of the Dingley Act, though the latter was a factor by doing away with a deficit of revenue, but to the increased volume of money caused by the increased production of gold and by a favorable trade balance which restored the per capita circulation in this country which prevailed prior to 1893, viz, $25 per head—the per capita during intermediate years having fallen as low as $23 per head.

BANK CREDITS INCREASED.

The effect of this increase of money was to increase the gold in the treasury and to increase the cash reserves in the banks. Each dollar of additional cash reserve gave an opportunity of the extension of $5 of credit by the banks, and thus a hundred millions additional cash in the banks meant a possible extension of credit to the extent of five hundred millions, which thus increased the check transactions of the country. The panic had been caused by a withdrawal of cash from the banks, which, in turn, compelled the banks to call in their loans.

The loans made by national banks in 1893 had been diminished from over two billion dollars, prior to 1893, to one billion eight hundred and seventy-one million in 1894, and in 1898 these loans were increased to two billion two hundred and fourteen millions, and in 1899 to two billion four hundred and ninety-six million dollars. In other words, between 1893 and 1899 the bank loans had been increased over six hundred millions, five hundred millions of which was accomplished between 1897 and 1899.

This statement is itself proof of the contention of bimetallicists, that, admitting the assumption of the monometallicists that most of the transactions of the country are accomplished by checks as distinguished from cash, it is also true that the aggregate amount of checks depends upon the amount of credits issued by banks, and that the amount of credits issued by banks depends upon the cash within their vaults, and the increase of five hundred millions in two years of bank credits, and the consequent multiplication of exchanges through bank checks, is directly traceable to about one hundred millions of additional cash deposited in the national banks.

Though no accurate data can be obtained as to State and private banks, it is safe to say that their credits had increased to nearly the same extent as that of the national banks, and it is fair to assume that within two years the bank credits have been increased at least eight hundred millions by the deposit with the banks of less than two hundred millions of additional money, secured through the increased production of gold and by a favorable balance of trade; for it must be recollected that of the three hundred millions of increased money secured during the past three years at least one hundred millions has gone into the Federal Treasury, and is therefore not a basis for bank credits.

The increase of prosperity during the past two years demonstrates the correctness of the theory entertained by bimetallicists, viz, that all other things being equal, prices will depend upon the quantity of money in circulation; that an increase of the money volume means higher prices and a diminution of the money volume means lower prices.

The demonetization of silver was started in 1873, at a time when the production of gold was lower than it had been for twenty years. There was no expectation at that time of an increase in the production of gold; on the contrary, the general opinion was that the output of gold was steadily diminishing, and yet, when more metallic money was constantly required to meet the increasing wants of business, it was proposed to demonetize the money which was increasing in volume and to give monetary efficiency only to the metal which was diminishing in product.

The gradual fall of prices from 1873 to 1897 accompanied the gradual and progressive reduction in the use of silver, until the whole world, suffering from the appreciation of gold and the depreciation of property and products, started out in search for gold. The result has been a tremendous increase in the product of gold, the annual product to-day being nearly treble the annual product when the process of silver demonetization commenced.

THE CLAIM OF THE BIMETALLISTS.

The increased production of metallic money has relieved the situation and proved the contention of bimetallicists as to the quantitative theory. All that intelligent bimetallicists claim is that the world needs more money; that all the gold and all the silver thus far produced has not been sufficient to meet the world's demand for money; that the world is more likely to get a sufficient supply from two sources than from one; that the vital question is a sufficient supply; that the rise in prices and the increase of prosperity consequent upon the larger production of gold during the last two years and the increased prosperity in this country consequent upon the addition to its money volume of nearly three hundred millions, have proved the contention of the bimetallicists and vindicated their theory.

BASIC MONEY CONTRACTED.

The vice of the proposed action is that the Republican party now proposes to take advantage of the increasing production of gold for the elimination of the existing stock of silver in this country from use. The metallic stock of the country consists of about nine hundred millions of gold and six hundred millions of silver, fifteen hundred millions in all. This is the only basic money, the only money of final redemption.

It is true there are greenbacks and national-bank notes in existence, but these are merely promissory notes payable in metallic money, issued either by the Government or the banks. While they aid in the exchanges they form no part of the money of the country; on the contrary, they themselves are redeemable in money. The metallic money needs no redemption; gold needs no redemption, silver needs no redemption; but the purpose of the dominant party is to make the six hundred millions of silver redeemable in gold by the Treasury.

It is true that they use the term "exchange"—that is to say, the Treasury is to exchange gold for silver—but if gold is to be given for silver, clearly silver will turn into a debt redeemable in gold, and thus become a liability of the Treasury. By this process the basic money of the country is to be contracted from fifteen hundred millions to nine hundred millions, and unless relief is given in some other way the contraction will be disastrous.

FUNCTION OF CHECKS.

To justify this great wrong, the dominant party claims that the great bulk of the business of the country is conducted upon a credit basis, and that credit involves absolute security as to the standard. It is claimed that checks and bills of exchange have largely taken the place of money. No greater fallacy exists than this. Checks and bills of exchange have not taken the place of money. Their use is merely supplementary to that of money. Their general use involves the necessity for more money instead of less money.

PRACTICE OF BANKS.

Of the money of the country, not counting the money in the Treasury, about two-thirds is now in the pockets of the people, used in the small exchanges; the rest is in the banks, and furnishes the basis of credit. The former has been aptly termed by the gentleman from Indiana "pocket money;" the latter has been aptly termed by the gentleman from New York "check money." It is the custom of banks to loan to their customers, on the average, about five times as much money as they have, the loans being turned into deposits, against which the depositors are accustomed to check.

The amount of the depositors' accounts, therefore, depends upon the amount of loans made by the banks, and the amount of loans depends upon the money that the banks have. Country banks are required to keep a reserve of 15 per cent of their deposits in cash; banks in reserve cities are compelled to keep 25 per cent, an average of about 20 per cent. Assuming, therefore, that the banks of the country have to-day loaned out as much money as they can upon their present reserves of cash, it is impossible to understand how they can loan out more money as business and population increase without an increase in cash.

An increase of cash in the banks will enable them to loan more money; a diminution of cash in the banks will cause them to loan less money. A contraction of bank loans means a contraction in bank deposits, and a contraction of bank deposits means a contraction of bank checks, so there is an intimate mathematical relation between the cash on the one hand and the bank loans, bank deposits, and aggregate of bank checks on the other.

Because the nature of the use of money has changed, it does not follow that there is need of less money. It is true that the proportion of cash transactions to check transactions is not so great as it was formerly in this country, and is not so great as in other countries where the cash system prevails, but the credit system means a multiplicity of exchanges, and increased bank credits necessitate increased cash reserves.

We on this side of the House admit the efficiency of credit in the exchanges of the world, but we insist upon it that credit is based upon money and can not exist without money. The basis of all credits in this country is the bank loans. The bank loans of the country of the national banks to-day aggregate $2,500,000,000. The cash in these banks to-day aggregates less than $500,000,000.

The loans are five times as great as the cash. So a dollar of pocket money has in exchanges only the efficiency of a dollar. A dollar of cash in a bank has the efficiency in exchange of five dollars, and any large withdrawal of cash from the banks immediately results in calling in the bank loans, the suspension of general credit, and the prostration of the industries of the country.

So that these gentlemen who insist on the qualitative theory in money as opposed to the quantitative theory, who insist that as civilization advances business is more largely done by instruments of exchange, by private checks, by bills of exchange and drafts, lose sight of the fact that the number of checks issued in a given period of time depends upon the bank deposits, the bank deposits depend upon the bank loans, and the bank loans depend upon the cash in the banks. Thus a direct relation in quantity exists between the credits of the country and the actual cash in the banks.

TRUSTING TO CHANCE.

What folly it is, then, when more basic money is being constantly required, to inaugurate a system which may gradually retire six hundred millions of silver dollars now a part of the money of the country. The answer is made that the increased production of gold will rapidly furnish the money necessary to take the place of the silver eliminated.

Thus chance is substituted for certainty. What certainty is there that the world will produce $300,000,000 in gold annually? What certainty is there that this country can secure any large proportion of that product? The war in the Transvaal may at any time cut off one-third of the production. The great spurt in the production of gold may be followed, as heretofore, by a decline. In addition to this, the movement of the countries of the world toward the gold standard is not half completed, and yet this country has suffered during the past six years by the immense accumulations of gold in Austria and Russia, accumulations not yet completed.

India is about to hoard gold for the purpose of establishing the gold standard, and if this movement is followed by China and by the South American States the new demands for gold will be very much greater than the current supply. It is reasonable to expect other nations to follow the example of the United States, and the action of the United States is likely to precipitate a scramble for gold such as took place when Germany took steps toward the adoption of the gold standard in 1873.

Nearly one-half of the metallic money of the world to-day is silver. How far can even the present production of gold, absorbed as it largely is in nonmonetary uses, such as the industrial arts and dentistry, avail to take the place of nearly four billions of silver dollars which are likely to be gradually eliminated from the world's currency under the initiative of the United States?

The gentlemen on the other side point with pride to the fact that under Republican auspices the money of the country has increased $300,000,000 in three years. But suppose the world's production of gold had remained as it was in 1873—that is to say, about $125,000,000 per annum; suppose it had remained as it was in 1893, about 150,000,000 per annum. Would this great increase in the volume of our money have taken place, and would the existing conditions of prosperity have been inaugurated?

And yet, gentlemen, just when you are congratulating yourselves upon an era of changed conditions, when you are felicitating yourselves upon a rise in prices of commodities throughout the country, with reference to which so many arguments were made the other way in the campaign of 1896, you are taking measures to attack this rise in prices and the advance of prosperity by repeating the experiment of 1873 and the experiment of 1893, for you propose practically to contract the volume of money now in circulation. Is that your purpose?

But you say you do not contract the volume of the currency; that you simply retire the greenbacks with gold, which takes the place of the greenbacks in the general circulation. But in order to pay for the greenbacks you must get gold in some form, either from this country or from foreign countries.

If you rely upon your revenues to give you the gold with which to redeem greenbacks, you must get it from this country. If you do not rely upon the revenue, you must get the gold by bond issues; and in either case, with the disposition of the people of this country to invest in our Government bonds, the gold will come from our own country, not from abroad. So that you actually draw $346,000,000 of the country's gold into the Treasury by the process of revenue or by the issue of bonds, and then pay it out in the redemption of greenbacks which are only issued again for gold. Do you mean to say that that is not a contraction of the currency of the country? The country has only the same amount of gold as before and is minus the greenbacks.

And then as to silver. You say that you do not pretend to redeem silver, but you propose to exchange gold for silver. That is a very cunning phrase, but I think it will deceive no one, for when gold in the Treasury is exchanged for silver out of the Treasury, the inevitable effect will be the retirement of the silver, and thus you practically change the silver of the country into a promise to pay gold. You stamp upon silver just as you do upon paper a promise to pay gold dollars.

At present we have fifteen hundred millions of basic money in this country, according to the report of the Director of the Mint, nine hundred millions of gold and six hundred millions of silver, all of it basic money, all of it money of final redemption, all of it money that needs no redeemer. Now, the bookkeeping of our financial system is divided into two columns, money in one column and debts in the other, debts payable in money, money the thing with which debts are paid.

You have here in this country 1,500,000,000 units of gold and silver available for the redemption of the vast mass of debts upon the other side of the column—national debts, State debts, municipal debts, railroad debts, corporate debts, private debts. You have $1,500,000,000 of redemption money, and opposed to it you have—what? Nearly $5,000,000,000 due to depositors through the agencies of banks alone, and billions upon billions superimposed upon the bank credits in the shape of municipal, State, national, corporate, and private indebtedness.

Yet you propose to take from the money column six hundred millions of silver, stamp upon it a promise to pay gold, and turn it over to the debt column. You diminish the money; you increase the debts. Do you believe that the business of the country will not be disturbed; that there is no process of contraction about that; that the pocket money that is in the hands of the people will not be disturbed; that the cash in the banks will not be disturbed; that our vast system of credit will not be disturbed, and that the use of check money in the transactions of life will not be disturbed? Nothing but an enormous production of gold in the future can prevent this, and as to this are you reckless enough to take the chance in the face of the fact that an increased demand for gold may be caused by your initiative?

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

Let me add a few words regarding the recent monetary negotiations with England and France. You will remember that in March, 1897, an act was passed providing for an international conference to secure a fixity of value between gold and silver at a common ratio by international agreement and that the President was empowered to call a conference, to appoint commissioners, and also to appoint special envoys to foreign countries.

In April following the President appointed Messrs. WOLCOTT, Payne, and Stevenson as special envoys. Proceeding abroad, they secured the cooperation of France, and then addressed themselves, in connection with the French Government, to the British ministry. Their views were received with hospitality by a ministry the majority of whom were in principle friendly to bimetalism. The time was ripe for the consideration of the question, as during the previous year resolutions favorable to an international adjustment of this matter had been passed by the German, French, and British parliaments.

The proposals involved in the main the opening of the India mints to the coinage of silver at the French ratio of 15½ to 1, to be accompanied by the limited increase of the use of silver in England and by free coinage in France and the United States.

The British ministry referred the matter to the India Government, which, after considering the matter for several months, presented an extended argument to the British ministry in favor of declining the proposals. The principal reason urged was that an arbitrary valuation of 16d. for the Indian silver rupee had been established, which meant a ratio of 22 to 1, whereas the market ratio at the time was about 35 to 1. The India government insisted, among other things, that the increase of the gold value of the Indian rupee involved in the proposed change would absolutely check exports from India; in other words, that India would suffer the injuries arising from appreciating money. The principal objection was to the suggested ratio of 15½ to 1, it being clearly the desire of the India government to maintain there the existing ratio of 22 to 1.

The British ministry, upon the receipt of this reply, communicated with the American ambassadors, stating that it would be compelled to yield to the views of the India government upon the question, and that the first proposal was one which they were unable to accept, but they clearly invited other proposals, Lord Salisbury using the following language in his letter:

It is possible that the time which has elapsed since the proposals were put forward in July last may have enabled the representatives of the two Governments concerned to form a more accurate estimate than was then practicable of the amount of assistance which they may expect from other powers and of the success which their scheme is likely to obtain. Her Majesty's Government might then be placed in a position to consider the subject with a fuller knowledge than they now possess of many circumstances materially affecting the proposals before them.

Nothing could have been more friendly than the final letter of Lord Salisbury, and no words could more clearly indicate a disposition to do something toward maintaining a fixed ratio between silver and gold by international agreement, and no words could be used which would more clearly express the desire that further communication should be had with the British Government on the subject.

Strange to say, the American Government dropped the matter there and proceeded no further. In fact, great uneasiness was manifested by the Administration during the period of these negotiations, which indicated a favorable result.

Whilst our envoys were abroad insisting upon it that the United States was friendly to bimetalism, and desired above all things to accomplish an international arrangement, the officials of the Treasury, in frequent interviews given out to the press and telegraphed abroad, expressed their firm and unalterable conviction that there was enough gold in the world for the maintenance of the gold standard, and that the pending negotiation was, and rightfully should be, fruitless. And during this very time the President was giving hospitable reception to the views of the Indianapolis monetary conference as to firmly establishing gold monometallism in this country. With what confidence could our envoys abroad press their views for bimetalism whilst our officials at home were giving in their adherence to gold monometallism?

It may rightfully be claimed therefore that the Administration abandoned these negotiations at the most critical period and at a time when the most powerful financial nation in the world was inviting a further consideration of the subject.

It will be observed that the prime minister inquired as to the amount of assistance which they might expect from other powers. A clear and businesslike conduct of these negotiations involved consultation with all the countries of the world, and particularly with those countries which were without silver stocks.

A diplomatic inquiry addressed to such countries, either by the envoys or by our ministers resident abroad in such countries, would evidently have secured some assurance as to the extent to which these other countries would go in the coinage of silver currently produced. It was an easy thing to put to them the statement that the money stock of the world was approximately one-third gold, one-third silver, and one-third paper, and that the very existence of the paper money indicated a scarcity of metallic money, and that a movement was invited for the gradual substitution in all countries of silver and gold for the paper money then outstanding and aggregating nearly $3,000,000,000.

At that time the South American States, all of which under the pressure of creditors had declared for the gold standard without having a gold currency, had issued more than $500,000,000 in depreciated paper; since then increased, according to the Mint Director's Report, to over $1,000,000,000.

The friendly mediation of the United States with those countries would have been potential in securing an agreement that they would at least absorb fifty or one hundred million dollars annually until their paper money was superseded by silver, and accompanying this arrangements could have been made to increase their gold stock so that ultimately they would have a bimetallic currency.

So also Russia had at that time nearly five hundred millions of paper money. She had been hoarding gold for years with a view to making specie redemption, and doubtless an arrangement could have been made with her by which she would absorb annually a considerable amount of silver.

Countries fearful of going to free coinage might have been requested to state the exact amount of silver bullion which they would turn into coin annually for a period of five or ten years. Thus the material could have been collected which would give the British Government the information which it wished, viz, an estimate of the amount of assistance which the United States and France might gain from other powers.

But no such inquiries were made; the envoys returned to America; their solicitation of the nations of the world ended, and the monometallists breathed freely when they ascertained that the expedition, which had been sent out in perfunctory compliance with a platform, ended without accomplishing its purpose.

Judged by present indications, it is safe to say that there is not a single government in the world to-day more determined in its hostility to the use of silver than the Administration now in power in the United States.

OUR INDICTMENT.

The indictment, therefore, which we present against the Republican party is that while in its platform declarations it has at times indicated a friendliness to silver, it has never yet by any authoritative declaration, either in its platform utterances, the reports of its Congressional committees, or in legislative action, declared any principle of monetary science upon which the country could rely as a guide for future action; that it has either openly and avowedly declared the policy of contraction of the basic money of the country or that it has sought by evasion and equivocation to defeat the force and the strength of the movement toward a bimetallic monetary system.

It commenced its policy of contraction at the close of the civil war by retiring the greenbacks and by denying silver access to the mints, and that, too, at a time when the addition to our population of 12,000,000 of Southern people, whose currency had been destroyed as the result of the war, demanded that the tools of exchange should be increased rather than diminished. It yielded an unwilling and grudging submission to the Bland Act only after the President's veto and after the bill had been forced upon it by the intelligent sentiment of the country.

After yielding to an increased coinage through the Sherman Act, as a part of the compromise by which the McKinley bill was passed, it joined with Cleveland in forcing its repeal.

Having promised international bimetalism in the last campaign by a platform solemnly pledging continued and earnest efforts to that end, it made perfunctory compliance only with its provision, and withdrew negotiations in the face of a friendly letter from the British ministry inviting further negotiations.

Ignoring the fact that the countries interested in securing a larger volume of money were debtor countries, the countries that lacked money and indicated their want by borrowing from other nations, and that the debtor and producing nations of the world have a greater absorbing capacity for new money than the creditor nations; that the hunger of debtor nations for more money was evidenced by the large issues of paper money existing in the world, little of which was kept upon a parity with gold, the Republican Administration ignored the nations that hungered for new money and sought only conference with creditor nations whose interest was in favor of an appreciating standard of money rather than in favor of a standard which would maintain stable values.

Invited by the British ministry to present to it the assurances of the extent to which other countries would join in supporting silver, a Republican Administration, vested by Congress with the full power to conduct negotiations with each individual country or to call an international conference, failed and neglected so to do, and now proclaiming through its representatives on this floor that international adjustment is impossible and even undesirable, records itself in favor of confining the money of this country to the metal smallest in quantity and most limited in production, in favor of eliminating from its currency the more plentiful metal which hitherto has been linked with gold in the support of values and just relations between debtors and creditors. It thus takes the initiative in a new scramble for gold among the nations of the world.

If the Republican party would declare that it has faith in the quantitative theory of money, that it believes that the basic money should be increased in proportion to population and business, but that the large increase in the production of gold furnishes a sufficient assurance that the world will receive the needed additional supply, and that if it does not steps will be taken to add silver to it by a bimetallic union as a part of our monetary system, we would at least have a declaration, after these long years of suffering and distress, caused by an abandonment of the principles of monetary science, that would indicate that the party was right in theory, and that in the end, if the production of gold was not sufficient to take the place of silver now being eliminated from use, and to meet the reasonable expectations for an increased volume of money, its practice would conform to its theory either by the use of silver or some other basic money, requiring no redemption save receivability for public and private dues. But the action of the Republican party gives no such comfort. It declares for no principle, but simply asserts itself as devoted to a particular metal as the source from which money shall be made, regardless of its insufficiency in production to meet the increasing wants of the world.

Against such a declaration the intelligent sentiment of the country will yet protest in terms that will be unmistakable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nevada has expired. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], in the speech he delivered a few minutes ago, called upon this side of the House to answer three questions: First, why there was prosperity during the Harrison Administration; second, why there was depression during the Cleveland Administration; and, third, why there is prosperity during the McKinley Administration.

Mr. Chairman, there is one answer to all of these questions, namely, that the supply and demand of basic money during these Administrations varied in such way as to produce the good or bad times. If you examine the history of the three Administrations, you will find these alternate conditions were produced by the alternate state of the supply of basic money.

WHY THERE WAS PROSPERITY DURING THE HARRISON ADMINISTRATION.

During the Harrison Administration there were good times. What caused them? The creation by legislation of more basic money.

In June, 1890, there was passed by Congress what is known as the Sherman Act, which provided for the purchase by the Government of 4,500,000 ounces of silver each month. Gentlemen on the other side may smile at the thought that the silver bill produced it, but nevertheless it is true, and we can prove it by the man most vitally interested in that Administration, namely, Benjamin Harrison himself.

In the annual message to Congress of President Harrison in December, 1890, we find the following clear statement from him concerning the Sherman Act:

The increased circulation secured by the act has exerted and will continue to exert a most beneficial influence upon business and upon general values. The enlargement of our currency by the silver bill undoubtedly gave an upward tendency to trade and had a marked effect on prices, but this natural and desired effect of the silver legislation was by many erroneously attributed to the new tariff act.

Surely the admission of the man most vitally interested in that Administration that the good times were caused by the silver legislation ought to determine conclusively that the condition was the result of the creation of more basic money during that Administration.

WHY THERE WAS DEPRESSION DURING THE CLEVELAND ADMINISTRATION.

Second. What caused the depression during the Cleveland Administration? The answer is plain. It was the destruction of basic money. That is what caused it. The first acts of the Cleveland Administration were the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act and the redemption in gold of the Treasury notes issued for the payment of the silver bullion under that law. It was during the early part of this Administration that silver was demonetized in India by closing the mints thereof to the free coinage of that metal. It was then that Austria attempted to resume specie payments in gold and thereby made great demands upon the gold of the world. Is it any wonder that there were depressed times under this Administration?

It was this destruction of basic money and this increased demand for gold which enhanced the purchasing power of gold and consequently decreased the price of all commodities and property, thereby producing stagnation in business and depressed times.

WHY THERE ARE BETTER TIMES IN THE MCKINLEY ADMINISTRATION.

Third. Why are we having better times during the McKinley Administration? The answer is clear. Because more basic money has been added to the currency of our own country and to that of the world. How? By the increased production of gold and the consequent increased coinage through the free-coinage laws for that metal. The production of gold for 1898 was $287,428,600—nearly double what it was in 1893. This increased production has to some extent relieved the strain upon and demand for gold and consequently produced rising prices. That is why times are better during the McKinley Administration.

The answers to the three questions propounded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] are therefore the application of facts to the one general principle of supply and demand of basic money.

But I want to warn my friends on the other side that if you place increased burdens upon gold, as this bill proposes to do, you will find that the increased demand for and value of gold will surely follow, with its necessary result, falling prices, unless from some unexpected source additional supply of that metal is found to relieve that strain. It is hardly possible that such an enormous increase can occur.

The gold-standard men have it in their power, by simply letting things alone, to continue the rising prices and consequent better times; but if they attempt to replace the stocks of silver and paper moneys in the world by gold, as this bill initiates, then the increased demand for gold will be so great as to cause a most severe and long-continued depression.

EXTENT OF THE PRESENT PROSPERITY.

But, sir, I am not here to admit that these times are as prosperous as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] would have us believe. I wish they were more prosperous. I concede there is some prosperity, but if you eliminate the articles which are manufactured and controlled by monopolies and trusts, you will find that there has been only a very moderate increase in price of the principal staple commodities.

Let us see whether that statement can not be demonstrated. In 1846 there was a man by the name of August Sauerbeck, of London, who undertook to tabulate and average the market quotations of 45 of the principal commodities used by man. He selected those which would be freest from the cheapening effects of inventions. They are in the breadstuffs, such as wheat, corn, and rye; in the meats, such as beef, pork, and mutton; in the metals, such as iron, copper, and lead; and in the fibers, such as cotton and wool. These commodities represent 80 per cent of the world's commerce. These tables have been kept to the present time. They show a decline from 1873 to 1896, when they reached 61 per cent of the average prices of the ten years around 1873, or 54.9 per cent of what they were in 1873.

Since 1896 there has been a rise of from only 1 to 3 points per year, the average for the first nine months of 1899 being 66.9 per cent of the average prices of the ten years around 1873, or 60 per cent of what they were in 1873. There is an increase in three years from 61 per cent to 66.9 per cent—about 6 points.

Now, that is an increase, it is true, and we hail it with delight, but it is not such a wonderful and unprecedented rise as is claimed by the gentleman from Ohio. Eighty per cent of the commodities of the world have been increasing a little over 2 per cent per annum. That is the extent of the elevation of prices. These tables can not be denied. They are published in the London Economist, a gold-standard paper, and consequently ought to be accepted as conclusive. I wish to incorporate as a part of my remarks the Sauerbeck tables.

Mr. Sauerbeck's index numbers, to which is added the annual average price of silver in London and to which is added index numbers of the same forty-five commodities, taking as their base the average prices of 1873, and a table showing the increase of the purchasing power of a dollar, taking the average prices of 1873 as the base.

MONEYS TO BE REDEEMED IN GOLD UNDER THIS BILL.

Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem in gold the following moneys of the United States:

The United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, consisting of $346,681,016
The Treasury notes, consisting of 89,026,280
And the standard silver dollar, consisting of 482,622,376

Making a total of 918,329,672

The enormous strain on the gold reserve of the Treasury by having such a large quantity of money redeemable in that metal must, it seems to me, again put this nation in the scramble for the world for more gold.

THE STRUGGLE IN EUROPE FOR GOLD.

To-day Great Britain, Germany, Russia, and France are in a desperate struggle to maintain their gold reserves.

I say there is a struggle going on between European nations in which each is trying to grab from the other its already diminished gold reserve and which threatens most serious monetary stringency and consequent depression.

The Washington Post, a gold-standard paper, in its issue of December 1, 1899, publishes the following Associated Press dispatch:

GOLD RESERVE RUNS LOW—BANK OF ENGLAND RATE RAISED TO 6 PER CENT—STOCK MARKET AFFECTED.

LONDON, November 30.

The stock market was somewhat unsettled to day in consequence of the rise in the discount rate of the Bank of England from 5 to 6 per cent. But there are none disposed to cavil much at this advance, as it is recognized as being essential that the reserve should be augmented and that 5 per cent is ineffective in attracting gold.

Apart from the demands for money arising from the activity of trade, the Government will have, sooner or later, to raise additional war funds. The reserve at present is so low that it might at any time be suddenly reduced to a figure necessitating something worse than 6 per cent.

It must be remembered that the high rate of discount mentioned in the dispatch has never been equaled since the great failure of the Baring Brothers, of London.

In the Washington Post of December 4, 1899, is the following:

STRINGENCY IN GOLD MARKET—EFFECT OF ACCUMULATION OF YELLOW METAL BY BANK OF RUSSIA.

LONDON, December 3.

The Statist, commenting on the rise in the bank rate, says: "The accumulation of money by the Russian Government is largely responsible for the present shortness of the gold reserve here and in Germany. Under the circumstances, the political situation and the financial troubles in St. Petersburg, we can scarcely expect the Bank of Russia to part with any of its gold."

"While the advance in the value of money here will prevent New York from withdrawing its balances from London until easier conditions prevail, we can not look for gold imports from the United States. We must be prepared for a further reduction of the reserve, and may witness very stringent conditions."

Again, Mr. Chairman, in the Post of last Saturday, December 9, 1899, I find the following:

The hardening of money in Berlin and Paris and the heavy loss in gold by the Bank of England for shipment to South America were evidences of the constriction of the money supply abroad. This was sufficient to keep the sterling exchange rate firm in spite of our own stiffening money rate, but there was a significant decline in the rate of exchange in Paris in response to London's measures to shift pressure upon that center.

Henry Clews & Co., bankers of Wall street, in their letter to the public to-day make the following statement:

The money centers all over the world are disturbed at the present time. The Bank of England's rate of discount is now 6 per cent, which is the highest for over ten years, and the rate in Berlin is 7 per cent. The management of the Bank of France is the most despotic of the world's great financial institutions, and they hold on to their gold with an iron grasp. The object, therefore, of the bank advancing its rate to 6 per cent, with the possibility of its going still higher, is to draw gold from other sections of the world. France, Germany, Austria, Russia, and America all are resistant, as wherever gold is lost in this struggle contraction, followed by liquidation, is a natural sequence.

Notwithstanding this deplorable condition of the gold reserves of Europe, and notwithstanding the war in South Africa has closed the mines of Johannesburg and diminished the gold supply of the world fully one-third, here in this bill is a proposition to enormously increase the burden upon gold by making the $918,000,000 of currency redeemable in gold.

It is folly at such a time to talk of increasing the burdens upon gold.

THE ENORMOUS CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY AUTHORIZED BY THIS BILL.

Sir, great as is the evil of redeeming all the other moneys of the Government in gold, the worst feature of this bill is that it does not provide that these moneys when once redeemed shall be reissued to meet the obligations of the Government, as the law now requires. By reissuing currency a very large amount can be kept in circulation based upon a relatively small reserve in gold, but, sir, the provisions of this bill authorize the impounding in the Treasury of all the moneys of this Government except gold, bank notes, and fractional coins. It authorizes the retirement of nearly one-half of the entire circulating medium of the nation, and more than half of that which actually circulates.

At the opening of this debate I asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] whether the redemption and retention in the Treasury of the 482,000,000 silver dollars would not produce a contraction of the currency to that extent. He answered, "Absolutely not, for the reason that the silver dollars can not be taken to the Treasury for exchange unless an equal amount of gold goes at once into circulation to take their place in trade."

Can such an answer as that deceive anyone possessed of reasoning powers? Where must the Government get the $482,000,000 of gold with which to retire the silver dollars? Undoubtedly from the circulating medium of the country. What difference does it make whether it produces a contraction of gold or silver? The same amount of contraction of currency takes place in either event. And what is true as to retirement of the silver dollars is also true as to the greenbacks and Treasury notes. It is a homely aphorism, but nevertheless true, that "you can not have your pie and eat it, too."

It has been contended by some that it is not likely that anyone will present these forms of currency for redemption. Possibly not for a short interval of time, but sooner or later the price level of Europe and the bids of England for gold will cause exportation of gold, which will be supplied through the redemption of these currencies. Already the bids for gold by the nations of Europe, as shown by the extracts from papers I have just read, are becoming irresistible, and in all likelihood the export of that metal will soon begin.

Then we will find this alarming condition: Our paper and silver currencies locked up in the vaults of the Treasury, with power to reissue only for gold.

At such times the largest circulating medium is necessary in order to prevent panics. At such times the use of silver dollars and silver certificates as basic money become the great mass of the currency.

But, sir, not only are the currencies impounded, but what becomes of the gold with which they are redeemed? Is it placed in circulation in this country? Oh, no; it is withdrawn from the Treasury for foreign export. The inevitable result must be that we not only contract the currency by impounding the greenbacks and silver, but at the same time we further contract it by shipping the gold to Europe. Thus when these redemptions occur, it doubly contracts the currency and consequently makes the stringency doubly severe.

Again, even if demand for gold from Europe should not occur, these redemptions in time will be made.

All respectable authorities on political economy admit the quantitative theory of money. If you increase the quantity of money, you decrease the purchasing power of the same. If you decrease the quantity of money, you increase its purchasing power.

The great writer on political economy, John Stuart Mill, has well said:

The value of money, other things being the same, varies inversely as its quantity, every increase of quantity lowering the value and every diminution raising it in ratio exactly equivalent.

Ricardo also crystallized that thought in this statement:

That commodities rise or fall in proportion to the increase or diminution of money I assume as a fact that is incontrovertible.

Under this principle, the holders of securities and obligations payable in money become directly interested in decreasing the quantity of money, so that the purchasing power of their securities may become greater.

The provisions of this bill place it in the power of almost any large moneyed institution to demand a large part of these redemptions. There are banks in New York City through which hundreds of millions of dollars pass each year. If at the end of business each day it should take all its greenbacks and silver certificates and demand from the subtreasury of that city gold or gold certificates therefor, it would not take many months for it to contract the currency enormously.

To say that banks or moneyed institutions will not do such a thing is to deny that man is guided in business by self-interest.

THE PROPOSED ANNIHILATION OF SILVER.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, in authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem silver dollars in gold, is a movement to totally annihilate silver as money. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is a new departure in the treatment of standard money in the history of the nations of the world. Sir, no nation on the face of the globe discredits any one form of basic money by redeeming it in another. There is not a nation to-day that redeems its silver in gold. There is only one nation and one colony that have the single gold standard in effect. They are Great Britain and Canada. Every other nation in the world has a full legal-tender silver coin resting upon its own base and acting as its own redeemer.

Even if the Secretary of the Treasury were required to pay out the silver redeemed to meet the expenses of the Government, it still would produce the annihilation of silver dollars as money. When you provide that the silver dollar may be redeemed in gold, you thereby destroy it as basic money and make it simply a promise to pay. When the policy of the Government to treat the standard silver dollars as mere promises to pay is once fixed, then there will arise the agitation, why should this Government have invested in silver dollars nearly $500,000,000 when they are mere promises to pay gold and such promises could be printed upon paper without practically any cost to the Government? The irresistible logic of such a course is to sell the silver dollars as bullion and totally annihilate silver as money.

Is the United States prepared to destroy nearly one-half of its basic money?

Is the world going to enter upon a policy of destruction of one-half of its primary money?

Sir, what result must follow if such a course is pursued? There is to-day and always has been nearly as much silver money as gold money in the world—a little over $4,000,000,000 of gold and a little less than $4,000,000,000 of silver.

If by legislation you strike down one of these metals as basic money, you must of necessity shift onto the other all the burdens of commerce and credit formerly borne by both metals. Nay, more, you must add the burden of redeeming the silver itself.

It would be like the killing of one of the horses of a double team and requiring the remaining horse not only to draw the same load but also to drag the weight of his dead companion.

As these metals are about equal in amount, you can readily see that the destruction of one of them must enormously increase the burden upon the other. Increasing the burden upon gold means increasing the demand for gold. You know the principle of supply and demand. You know that if you increase the demand you enhance the value of that which you demand. Hence the increase in the demand for gold must increase its value.

If gold were simply a commodity, such as iron or copper, its increase in value would be of very little consequence. It is true when one purchased a gold article they would have to pay a little more for it, just as they do now in purchasing an iron or copper article, but that is the only way in which it would affect the people.

The reason why every man, woman, and child in the world is interested in the increase in the value of gold is not because they have gold, but because they do have those things which are to be measured by gold, namely, property and commodities.

Increase in the value of your standard money means what? It means the increase of that which measures everything purchasable in the world. That means that your gold dollar buys more of commodities and property. That appears well for the man who has the gold dollar; but how about the man who sells? He is bound to yield up more of property and products to obtain that dollar, and that means that he must sell at a less price. If the seller has obligations to be paid in such enhanced value, it often means bankruptcy and ruin.

HAS THE INCREASED ANNUAL PRODUCTION OF GOLD OBVIATED THE NECESSITY OF SILVER DOLLARS?

But our gold-standard friends say that the annual production of gold has doubled in recent years, and therefore there is no necessity any longer for silver dollars. They confuse the annual production with the world's stock of gold. In fact, the annual production, though large compared with former annual productions, is yet exceedingly small when compared with the world's stock of gold. The annual production for 1898 was $287,428,000, fully one-half of which goes into the arts, which leaves only $144,000,000 for the monetary uses of the world. This is only 3 per cent of the world's stock of gold. Three per cent increase is no more than sufficient to keep pace with the legitimate increase of commerce and is totally inadequate to supply the place of the silver of the world. The proportion which the United States would get according to its relative commercial importance would be about $35,000,000; hence it would take, even at this large rate of production, about fourteen years to supply the place of silver in this country alone. To predict that the annual production will for a long series of years largely increase is to indulge in the wildest fancy.

When the gold mines in California and Australia were discovered in 1849 the moneyed power of the world predicted that the production of gold would be so great as to make it necessary to adopt the single silver standard, and Germany, Holland, and Austria did adopt that standard in accordance with that sentiment. Some time after that the great Comstock lode in Nevada was discovered, and then it was predicted that Nevada alone would produce $500,000,000 of silver a year.

It was then that the demonetization of silver was begun. All of these predictions proved false. To-day California is not producing one-fourth as much gold as in the '50s, and Nevada is not producing one-tenth as much silver as then. Yet there was as much foundation for making those predictions then as there is for making these now.

SHORTAGE IN THE PRECIOUS METALS.

Notwithstanding the increase in the annual production, there is to-day and always has been a shortage in the precious metals. This statement is demonstrated by the fact that nearly every nation is compelled, either through its banking institutions or through its treasury department, to issue a substitute for money in the form of credit or uncovered money. No nation would resort to the issuance of such a substitute unless there was an imperative necessity for a greater circulating medium, and the very fact that that necessity exists demonstrates the shortage in the precious metals.

Secretary Gage in his last report estimates that the total uncovered paper money of the world amounts to $2,836,300,000. This can not be supplied by gold in twenty years, even at the enlarged production of this year. If to this uncovered paper money is added the silver to be supplanted by gold, it will take the gold product for fifty years to accomplish it, without allowing any increase for the increasing demands of commerce.

The great cause of panics is the issuance of credit money. The government that does it either through its treasury or through its banking institutions is bound at some times to have most stringent conditions. Like the individual that goes in debt, sooner or later liquidation will be demanded, and usually at the most inopportune time, and distress will follow. With money that needs no redemption, such as silver and gold, there can be no such thing as a run on the Treasury. Sound economics would therefore sanction the proposition to substitute silver for all promises of the Government to pay if there were a sufficient quantity of that metal together with gold to supply the place of the other currencies. But while there is a shortage in the precious metals, contraction makes the balance of the money dearer and makes the conditions more critical.

When, in addition, the silver dollars are replaced with gold, it will produce an alarming condition with a certainty, other things remaining as they are, of a fearful depression, with falling prices for a number of years.

It is estimated that there is built upon each dollar of currency at least $15 of credit and $30 of property value. Hence the destruction of each dollar of currency entails a loss of $15 of credit and $30 of property value. The destruction by impounding the $918,000,000 of currency will therefore produce a loss, other things remaining the same, of $13,770,000,000 of credits and $27,540,000,000 of property value in the world.

POLITICAL EFFECT OF THE PASSAGE OF THIS BILL.

From a political standpoint the passage of this bill is bound to shift the issues a little to the disadvantage of the Republican party in the campaign of 1900. Although I am a firm believer in the ability of this Government to establish the parity of the metals at the ratio of 16 to 1 by giving to silver the same mintage rights now given to gold, yet I must confess that there were a large number of bimetalists in 1896 who doubted that ability, and who clung to the Republican party in the hope that it would carry out its pledge in favor of international bimetalism.

The passage of this bill by a unanimous vote of the Republicans will make the issue in 1900 that of gold monometallism. It drives from the Republican party not only those who believe in the free coinage of silver, but also all those sincere bimetalists who have hoped for international bimetalism and who have violently opposed the gold standard.

To fasten the single gold standard upon the country now is a most egregious error. We ought, under any consideration, to hold ourselves in a position so that when the commercial value of silver rises we can link the metals together by free-coinage laws.

The cause of the free coinage of silver may appear gloomy at times, but nevertheless I have a firm conviction that, even if it should not come by legislation of this country, the world will again some day be on a bimetallic basis. It may be soon, but it surely will be in time.

Even if we should be defeated at every election, the conditions will some day force bimetalism.

Sooner or later there is bound to come a great conflict between two powerful nations. Although it is to be deplored, yet it will surely come. When that time arrives, bimetalism will be established. How?

It is a fact that no great war was ever fought on the gold standard. It is true that the great United States could fight little Spain on that standard, but Spain could not fight the United States on that standard. Within fifteen days after the declaration of war Spain went to a silver basis, which raised the price of silver all over the world nearly 10 per cent.

The reason no great war can be fought on the gold standard is because as soon as nations of equal strength become engaged a doubt arises in the minds of the inhabitants of each country as to whether it can win and consequently as to whether its paper money will go to a discount. The depositor in banks will think that perhaps the paper money may not remain good, and therefore the next time he draws money he will demand gold. At the very commencement of such a struggle each nation will find when it most needs a large circulating medium, when enormous contracts are being let for war supplies, that the gold has been withdrawn and is being hoarded by the people. When the nation is in most need of a large currency it finds it has hardly any.

The legislative bodies of each will immediately enact laws for an adequate currency. It is then that the capitalists will insist that the governments should not issue paper money, for fear that an overissue will make it worthless. It is then that they will insist that if gold can not be obtained, silver must be legalized and used.

The enormous demand in war times by two powerful nations upon the limited quantity of silver in the world available for coinage will, in my judgment, undoubtedly so increase the value of that metal as to establish its parity with gold.

I do not, however, believe that we will have to wait for such conditions. The passage of this bill will, in my judgment, produce such a revulsion in the public mind as to make the chances for the establishment of bimetalism, through the election of 1900, most excellent, indeed.

When bimetalism is again established, the world will be upon a financial basis that will lessen panics, diminish the financial embarrassments of governments, and produce such a fair measure of values as to be equitable and just to both debtors and creditors. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is recognized for twenty minutes.

MR. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, this is no question to be settled by financial learning or by shuffling of the cards that we call statistics. It is no party question, but one on which members of the opposite party have united with my own in saying that it is needful that the present standard of value throughout the country should be decreed by statute to be maintained. That is the only question to be argued here.

I was surprised that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] should have found opportunity, in answer to the kindly and temperate speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], to accuse this side of the House of being hypocrites, to attack our election as gained by fraud, and to say that it was a victory of corporations.

MR. CHAIRMAN, the gentleman is a prince of courtesy in private relations. We can lay his expressions only to the bitterness of irretrievable defeat. His speech might have been epitomized as follows: "Discomfort guides my tongue and I can speak of nothing but despair," because this question has been settled. Let us delay but a moment to point out also that while a lawyer may sometimes be justified in abusing those upon the other side, and even if he may appeal from the court of appeals by swearing at it at the next corner, it may not be worth while to abuse that court of appeals too much in public, and that this judgment was the verdict of the people on the plain question submitted as a single issue at the election throughout the United States, the issue whether the transactions of this country should be in honest money.

It was not the issue of the rich against the poor. It was the issue of protection of the poor, for they are always the creditors—are creditors day by day in their wages, creditors in bank deposits, which are secured by mortgages given by the rich; creditors in insurance, which is likewise so secured. The campaign was fought by them and for them on that issue; it was won on that issue.

In bringing in this bill to carry that decision into effect this House brings no new thing before the country. They only carry out the verdict of the people. Now, let us add that it is an issue of importance. It is true that for the last twenty years a gold dollar of full value has been the standard, and that by the action of the Government the silver dollar, worth intrinsically but 50 cents, has been maintained at a parity with it in business transactions.

This has been done as a policy, carried out by men of both parties. Mr. Cleveland maintained that policy as fully as the present Administration. But the question now is whether that policy shall be made by statute a final and settled policy; and the danger is that, no matter what this House may think, and whatever its majority may be, no matter what the Senate may think and its majority may be, that policy may, under the present laws, be reversed by the will of a single man if elected by a sweep at some Presidential election.

This is not a party question. I have been appealed to for the last two years by my Democratic friends saying, "When will you make this matter certain? When will you relieve the country from this terror? When will you make it clear that we are to have a certain measure of value?" The questioners are not so much Republicans as Democrats. I could only say to them, "We will meet this question when our proposition may be turned into a legislative act. As long as the Senate is hostile any proposition that we may make may be misconstrued, and it may contain concessions made for the sake of compromise that would weaken our action. We will wait until we can act; then we will bring forward a measure at the first possible moment." We are fulfilling our pledge. As we do it we appeal to gentlemen on the other side to let it not be a party measure.

This is really all that is in this bill. It is recognized as such in this debate. There are subsidiary matters with reference to the circulation of national banks, introduced only to afford relief to the feelings of those that think there might be contraction and to insure relief to business in case such contraction should ensue. But these clauses are subsidiary. Will not the representatives of the old Democracy—the Jackson hard-money Democracy—stand with the people of the country for honest money? You have before you this fetish of a silver dollar, composed of but 50 cents of value plus a legislative fiat. It is worshiped as the equal of the true. "Choose you this day whom ye will serve." Among your party the prophets are many who say, "Follow with our idol." Follow not. "Choose you this day whom ye will serve," for the lightning of the voice of the people, which is often almost that of the Almighty, has fallen and devoured up the altars of those who have resisted under the sanctity of a false dogma.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for a moment?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If it comes in the line of the argument I am making.

Mr. GAINES. Did you promise your constituents that you would vote for a law to make the bonds and obligations of this Government payable in gold alone in making your speeches to them?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes, sir; I did. And I will say that the platform says that until an agreement for bimetallic use of gold and silver can be obtained the established gold standard shall be preserved.

Mr. GAINES. Well, now, have you and your party abandoned all idea of international bimetallicism?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We never promised that this could be done. We did expect to see it. Have you any idea that it can be obtained? If it can be, we always have stood up to our pledges. But you have no knowledge of the fact that it will be the conditions as they are now.

Mr. GAINES. I will answer your question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not care for it now.

Mr. GAINES. You asked for it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It will come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will hear your answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is out of order.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I give the gentleman leave to answer yes or no.

Mr. GAINES. I am not out of order, with all due respect to the Chairman, as the gentleman yields to me.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Now, answer my question.

Mr. GAINES. Did your President, Mr. McKinley, when he thought international bimetallicism was about to succeed, send an extra message asking for the creation of a commission to fasten the gold standard upon this country according to the Indianapolis platform?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. My question was susceptible of an answer, yes or no.

Mr. GAINES. My question was, Did your President abandon international bimetallicism?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I shall not brook further interruption, because I do not think interruption of that kind is valuable. I asked the question whether it was probable. That was a question that could have been answered yes or no, and I leave it to the House. Now, I am rather glad that the question has been asked, for it allowed me to say that until this can be obtained the existing gold standard should be maintained.

This bill says it shall. Without this bill we can only say that it may be maintained if the Secretary of the Treasury chooses to do so. Like all great financial measures, this bill is simple. It declares only what is fact. It enacts only what would have been enacted had the conditions been as they are to-day. It declares that gold is the standard. My silver friends will every one acknowledge that it has been such under the policy of the Government during the last twenty years. It declares that the interest and principal of Government obligations shall be paid in gold, and they have been so paid in gold ever since they were issued and paid against the protest of my silver friends. We thus declare only what has been a fact.

But in so doing and in ordering the payment of the obligations and their interest in gold, we come, I admit, to the root of the question, because we thereby order that gold shall be exchanged for silver whenever that exchange is demanded. It is not necessary to go on and say, as we do, that the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion effect such exchange. The Government of the United States is now paying out for interest $40,000,000 in every year in gold. It must have this gold, but must take the silver dollar and the silver certificate for every dollar of taxes and every dollar of customs if so required.

If the people are not willing to pay gold into the Treasury, and the Government must pay it out, the Government must buy it as it did in the days of the late Administration. It bought it by issuing bonds. That is the reason that we now have in the Treasury $500,000,000 worth of silver against $400,000,000 of certificates; it is because we could not get the silver into the market, and we had to buy gold and leave silver in the Treasury to the amount of the extra $100,000,000. We have therefore bought gold.

We do not have to do so now, because, thanks to a protective tariff and thanks to the doctrine of honest money, business has revived. Prosperity is real. The gentleman from Nevada does not believe with my friend who preceded him that this is a bogus prosperity. Every man knows that business has revived, everyone knows that the balance of trade is in our favor. Everyone knows that we are able to pay our debts. Our taxes come into the Treasury in gold, and we pay our interest in gold, and it is in order that we may remain able so to do that we declare, in fulfillment of our pledge and in fulfillment of the vote of the people, that the obligations of the Government shall be so payable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the committee please, I pass very briefly over other provisions of the bill. This measure provides that when greenbacks are redeemed in gold or silver coin they shall only be paid out again on return of like gold or silver coin. That is right, for otherwise both greenbacks and gold are put in circulation when one should only be the representative of the other.

Gentlemen ask whether our currency will not be contracted. No. Real currency, real money, always has to be bought. It is bought by labor at the mines; it is bought sometimes by the issue of Government bonds, but when these bonds are issued they do not buy simply from American citizens. They are available to buy gold from all over the world. It is likewise because our trade and our manufactures have been such that we could export, and because our farming has been such that we could export farm products, that we have been able to get gold into this country. Fear not the boggy of contracted currency while you have expanded industries. If a man makes more than he spends, he will save money. If the nation makes more than it spends, it will get money. A money plenty is not the cause, but the effect of prosperity.

Only a word more. I will not discuss the question of banking; that is for experts. The changes that are made are made in view of the fact that when the national banks were established they got 6 per cent United States bonds and 6 per cent on their discounts, and they could afford to pay a tax of 1 per cent a year. Now, when interest is at 3 per cent, it has been found that that tax is oppressive. The bill in the Senate and the bill in the House propose a reduction of that tax, so that the bank can give the country more currency when it is required. The banks are also allowed to issue currency up to the par value of their bonds, instead of to 90 per cent only. And yet my friend from New York takes up this provision and says there will be a contraction of the currency, and appeals to the gold Democrats to get into the car with themselves, who would pull down the honest money of this country! I appeal to you as patriots to look at the present and not at the past. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I desire to submit the following remarks under the leave granted by the House:

The measure will have the approval of the whole people. It represents the pledge of the party. It is simple. It is frank and outspoken. It is all the more a great financial measure because it is simple honesty and simple good sense. It faces the facts. It recognizes, declares, and enforces a policy that has been long settled, while in the minor particulars in which it changes the law as to national-bank circulation it makes that law only what it would have been originally had the conditions then been what they are now.

Since specie payments were resumed our dollar has been worth 100 cents. All business has been based upon a gold coin that would hold its value though it passed through the fire and although it went across the seas. We had hoped that the silver dollar might regain that character. But we have had to face the fact that its fluctuations in intrinsic value can not be controlled by fiat, that its depreciation is not temporary, but permanent, and that its honor and equal value can only be maintained by pledging thereto the credit of the Government. The brave man faces this exigency. It is a foe, but—

With fearless eye he sees him,
With fearless hand a welcome gives him.

Again, when the bill declares that the nation's debt, both principal and interest, shall be paid in gold, it meets the whole situation. Our Secretary of the Treasury says:

It will be equally effective if by positive law it were made mandatory upon the Treasury Department so to pay and receive the two kinds of money—silver and gold—as to maintain their parity under all conditions. Such action would be in conformity to what has already been established as the policy of the Government.—Report of Secretary of the Treasury, pages LXXVII, LXXVIII.

Some day we shall find it well to put intrinsic value in all our coinage. It is sufficient now to decree the continuance of the great and honorable policy that the Government will pay gold or accept silver on request, and will see that every dollar shall be equal to every other dollar.

The so-called endless chain still exists as long as there is revenue to collect and interest to pay, and is independent of the existence of the greenback. But it is to that very endless chain alone that we owe the untarnished honor of our currency and the credit of our Government.

This measure, as we have seen, likewise provides that when greenbacks are redeemed in gold or silver coin they shall only be paid out again on the return of this gold or silver coin. The existence of four hundred millions of demand notes and four hundred millions of silver certificates, which must be maintained equal to gold, makes a combined sum which would be dangerous to any government in bad times. As patriots, while revenues are plentiful and the balance of trade is in our favor, so that we are receiving money from abroad instead of sending it there, we should make provision against an evil day by diminishing these obligations. A nation which does not lay up in summer may find itself poor in winter. There are some of us who can not help wishing that it were possible to retire all these notes and refund the whole Government debt at a lower rate of interest.

When the bill allows the formation of small national banks in small towns it does only what the original law would have done had the use of banks and bank checks been as universal then as it is to-day.

When the bill proposes to allow bank notes to be issued up to the par value of the Government bonds which secure them it does only what the original law would have done had the credit of the United States then been what it is to-day, had it been certain that these bonds would not have sold at a discount.

The House currency bill and that proposed by the committee of the Senate suggest different remedies as to national-bank taxation. The House bill would take off the tax on circulation and put it upon assets, and would fall more heavily on city banks of large comparative capital. The Senate bill leaves the tax on circulation but reduces it upon such currency as shall be issued upon a proposed new 2 per cent Government bond. It is for an expert on banking to say which of these remedies is better. Each is good, for either would remove an oppression.

It may be urged that the House bill is fairest in principle inasmuch as it taxes each institution according to its property and ability to pay. It may be said in reply that the funding of the whole national debt at 2 per cent would be a great step forward, and that a tax on circulation operates to restrain it when it is not needed, so that there is an opportunity for elasticity and expansion of currency when the market demands it and will pay for it.

At the end of the last fiscal year the banks owned over a hundred millions more of Government bonds than the notes which they had issued.

The Report of the Comptroller of the Currency, pages 1 and 2, states:

Resources.	June 30, 1899, 3,583 banks.
United States bonds to secure circulation.....	$228,870,310.00
United States bonds to secure United States deposits.....	78,497,040.00
United States bonds on hand.....	21,001,310.00
National-bank notes outstanding.....	199,358,382.50

The circulation would possibly not have been so restrained had there been no tax upon it, and under the present system there is thus considerable margin for expansion of our circulating medium in case of need.

But all this is matter of detail. A conference committee can settle it. It is for us only to rejoice that this bill is at last before the Legislature; that it will be passed substantially as it is, two Houses and the President concurring; that it gives the sanction of law to the policy which has been adopted by the great men of both parties; that it gives a seal to the obligations which have thus far been written in the hearts of every patriot; that it fulfills a pledge to which the majority of this House are in honor bound; that it speaks the language of simple truth and enforces the simple obligations of common honesty.

The country appeals to men of every party for a verdict. Say the truth in your vote on this bill. If a full-value gold dollar be the standard of value, say so. Do not vote "no" unless a 50-cent silver dollar be your standard. There is no compromise between the two. It is not a fight between gold and silver, for one dollar's worth of silver is worth just as much as a dollar in gold. The fight is between a dollar worth 100 cents and free coinage of a silver dollar worth only 50 cents. This bill declares that such a dollar is only in use and can only be in use because the credit of the Government is behind it, and that that credit shall stay behind it.

Say if this be not true. Some of my Democratic friends appeal to gold and silver Democrats to get up together in the same chariot. That chariot is not a band wagon this year. The honorable men of that party must determine what is honest and what is right, and on what platform they will stand before the people. And, outside of all party, we appeal to every true and patriotic man, choose to-day what you will do. Will you follow honesty and register the decree of the people? Will you stand up for honest money? Will you recognize the facts as they are, or will you shuffle and equivocate on this matter? It is time to act.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, it rarely falls to the lot of a man in public life to do an official act so wise, patriotic, and far-reaching in its effects as to stand out conspicuously from among the immature, unnecessary, and I might almost say unwise measures constantly engrossing the mind of a legislator and inviting the attention of the public.

To-day, however, marks a new period in the affairs of our country. After years of patient devotion and interesting discussion by the people a climax has been reached. The scattered rays of individual opinion have finally crystallized, and the period of helpful, courageous, and necessary financial legislation is at hand. It is wholly unnecessary, in my opinion, to retrace the steps that have finally culminated in this unanimous report, but the experience, wisdom, and devotion reflected in this bill is a subject of universal commendation. We knew the committee differed among themselves; not in the ends sought, but the means by which to attain it; but their unanimity and earnest championship of this bill clearly discloses the fact that minor matters of difference have been waived in order that we might act unitedly in accomplishing the central purpose of fixing definitely and distinctly the gold standard into law.

The Republican party in their national convention took advanced grounds upon this question, and in the campaign that followed, aided and assisted as we were by many Democrats who regarded the subject of currency reform as paramount to party expediency, swept the country like a tidal wave, bearing into the vortex of political oblivion the Populistic champions of repudiation and disaster.

Out of the great victory of 1896 came the responsibility for wise currency legislation. We are now face to face with that sacred pledge to the people. The requisite majority for sound money now sit in both branches of Congress, while the great leader of all the forces for honest money sits in the Executive chair prepared to carry out the will of the people so unequivocally expressed.

The country waits to know whether our promise shall be redeemed. We should be united upon this side of the Chamber. Is there a hesitating doubter among us? From what State does he come? Hold him up, Mr. Chairman, to the public gaze! Let his constituents see what a pitiful spectacle the political cringer presents in the face of a great public duty! Mr. Chairman, there is no battle of the standards. The only possible controversy in the past has been between the gold standard and no standard, and the thoughtful, earnest man of affairs, the farmer and the laborer, bone and sinew of our body politic, whose enterprise and public spirit have made the country what it is to-day, sound-money Democrat as well as Republican, when the issue was made stood like a stone wall against the proposition to debase our currency. When the Free Silverite proposed to Mexicanize our country with a financial fallacy, as spurious as it was dangerous and as fallacious as it was tempting, the eyes of the civilized world were then upon us. It was just at the close of a century rich in moral, financial, and industrial achievements, but there was no hesitating or doubt. America stood the strain that was put upon it, and out of the turmoil of unfair discussion came the true principle of monetary reform.

The argument of the Silverite was that if the gold standard were sustained the currency of our country would be contracted and money would appreciate. How shameful and false the statement! Instead of contracting the currency it has been expanded; instead of making money dearer we have actually cheapened it, until to-day money is loaned at a less rate of interest than ever before in the history of the country.

When Mr. Bryan was nominated as the Free Silver candidate for President in 1896 the total money in circulation in the United States was $1,509,725,200, and on December 1 of the present month, but three and one-half years later, the total money in circulation in the United States is $1,985,930,934, an increase of $476,205,734, or 31½ per cent.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. I should like to ask the gentleman how much of that increase is in silver dollars coined by this Government?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I will tell the gentleman before I finish, if he will be patient.

Mr. SULZER. Can you not answer that now?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; but not without interrupting the continuity of my thought.

Mr. SULZER. And I would like to ask also if the present Administration did not coin those silver dollars at the ratio of 16 to 1?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Why, certainly; but not in unlimited quantities. I think my answer will be satisfactory to the gentleman from New York when that part of my argument is reached.

The steady and rapid growth in circulation of money in the United States gives the lie to the prediction of the free-coinage advocate, while in the month of November just passed our money in circulation increased $22,214,816, or over $700,000 every working day in the month, and every dollar of this money, whether gold, silver, or paper, is the equal of every other dollar in the hands of the richest or the poorest man in the Republic. What a splendid achievement in three and one-half years. Is it any wonder that scores of honest voters, tempted by the silver panacea, should now desert their cause and come to the support of President McKinley?

Even prominent men, high in the councils of the silver party, some of whom occupy seats on the other side of this Chamber, are now advising that it would be useless to make silver the issue in another Presidential contest, as the people now have their eyes open and will not be led blindly by reckless leaders. It was stated by our opponents that if the gold standard prevailed the coinage of silver would be suspended, that our mints would be closed down, that no more silver would be coined, and many well-intentioned voters were led to the belief that our party stood for gold monometallism. How interesting must be the report just published by the Director of the Mint. He says that—

The coinage of gold this year was the greatest in our history, amounting to $108,177,180, as against $64,634,805 in the preceding year, and that it would have been considerably larger if the capacity of the mint had been greater.

He says that—

The stock of gold bullion on hand increased from $90,688,332 on July 1, 1893, to $119,882,722 on July 1, 1899, while the coinage of silver dollars from bullion purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, was $18,254,709, as against $10,028,780 in the preceding year, and that the coinage of subsidiary silver during the year just closed was $9,466,877.65, against $6,482,804 in the preceding year.

Who now has the boldness to say that the present Administration proposes to discontinue the coinage of silver? I trust this answer will be satisfactory to the gentleman from New York.

The advocates of free silver stated again and again in the last Presidential campaign that gold was getting scarcer, and that it was dangerous to adopt a diminishing product as a standard of value. At the time the free-silver candidate for President delivered his speech of acceptance in New York we had in circulation gold coin and gold certificates amounting to $498,449,242, while there is now in circulation in the United States, upon the first of the present month, gold coin and certificates amounting to $778,388,303, an increase of $279,939,061, or 56 per cent, in a little over three years.

Where is the false financial prophet of that period? Is he the apologist upon the other side of this Chamber? Are you still defending this old story, riddled from end to end by the practical experience of the last three years? Or are you looking and longing for other political issues with which to deceive the American voter? If so, I warn you that mere expediency courts and deserves disaster.

The United States is a world power. The products of our labor find their way through trade channels into every port of the world. This condition of affairs is becoming more important every year. The immense foreign trade in which we are engaged has this year touched its highest point, aggregating nearly two billions of dollars, with a balance of trade in our favor of $529,874,813, while our domestic trade is prosperous in all departments of commercial activity. Surely this is the result of a wise governmental policy, which should be the proud pleasure of all good citizens to sustain.

Our total exports in the fiscal year of 1899 to the gold-standard countries of the world amounted to $1,071,072,166, and to those classified as having a silver standard $32,721,574, while our imports in the last fiscal year from countries having a gold standard were $499,896,284, and from those countries having a silver standard during the last fiscal year but $86,391,407, thus making our total commerce in the fiscal year with the countries having a gold standard $1,570,968,450, while with those having a silver standard our total commerce was $139,112,981.

How idle it would be for our country to go to a silver basis in the face of these astounding figures, which show our close and extended commercial relations with gold-standard countries and the much smaller trade enjoyed by us with silver-standard countries. The gold-standard countries of the world are the most progressive nations in the world, including as it does Austria-Hungary, Belgium, British North America, Costa Rica, Denmark, Egypt, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Japan, Netherlands, Sweden, Norway, Russia, Switzerland, Uruguay, Argentine Republic, Brazil, Chile, Italy, Portugal, Spain, and Venezuela, while the silver-standard countries only include second and fourth rate powers, such as China, Guatemala, Honduras, British East Indies, Mexico, Nicaragua, Bolivia, Ecuador, Colombia, and Peru.

There is not a well-informed man who will not readily concede that it is the part of wisdom for our country to have its underlying standard of value a unit recognized among the countries with which we have such important and extended commercial relations.

Is it any wonder, Mr. Chairman, that under our system labor is steadily employed, that agriculture flourishes, that manufactures test the full capacity of our factories, that debts are being paid, improvements being made, and the people generally contented and happy? Among the most powerful influences that have contributed to this enviable situation, in sharp contrast with the depression and idleness of three years ago, is the confident expectation that sound currency legislation will be enacted promptly by the party in power, thus placing our finances upon a solid and enduring basis, free from the influences of disturbing political conditions and beyond the reach of demagogues and agitators.

Mr. Chairman, this is our sacred duty, and it must be met ably and fearlessly. This is not a mere party question. We have been sustained in our controversy by men of all parties, and the right solution has to do with the welfare of the whole people and means the weal or woe of the country for generations to come. We have been under a gold standard for many years, but the maintenance of this policy was largely a discretionary one with the Secretary of the Treasury, and his power often questioned and sometimes denied. We must make it definite and obligatory. This bill fixes the standard and obliges the Government to maintain all our money—gold, silver, and paper—at a parity, thus insuring the monetary equilibrium of our financial affairs. In the redemption of this sacred pledge to the people I am proud to say that Michigan, represented in this national Capitol, is unitedly in favor of this bill, and I have been authorized by the entire delegation from our State to say that their votes will be recorded in favor of this measure, the passage of which will be viewed with satisfaction by the people of this country, who fully understand that its significance and purpose are identical with their own material welfare and the happiness and comfort of the homes of America. [Great applause on Republican side.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, March 4, 1897, the present Republican Administration was placed in control of the executive branch of our Government and was also placed in control of the House of Representatives. At that time we found our country, financially speaking, in a deplorable condition. Our revenues were not equal to our expenditures and had not been during the preceding four years. In the last Cleveland Administration it had become necessary, in the time of peace, in order to meet our current expenses and in order to maintain the parity of our money, that we borrow $260,000,000. It is currently reported that the syndicate of home and foreign money manipulators made out of these loans, which the people had to pay, from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000. This loan was made secretly, in so far as giving the people a chance to take a share in it, and was made at a time when we were at peace with ourselves and with the world and at a 4 per cent and 5 per cent rate.

Under the present Administration it became necessary to sell $200,000,000 of bonds to supply ways and means for carrying on the war with Spain. A different policy was pursued in disposing of the bonds. We had for President a man who had confidence in the people. He had heard it said that there was no money in this country in sufficient quantities to meet the requirements of trade and business. He had heard it said that the existing gold standard was destructive to the financial condition of the people. He had heard it said that the people had no confidence in the financial integrity of the Government. He knew that he was about to enter upon a war with a foreign country. He knew that war was to be conducted largely upon the high seas. He did not know what would be the end of the war except that he had faith to believe that the American arms would be successful. He did not know but what the war, when started, would be world wide before ended and that all Continental Europe would enter into and take sides.

Surrounded as he was by these lowering and dense clouds, impenetrable alike to himself and to his people, he thought that the way to test his people was to see if they had faith in their Government, its honesty and its stability. He applied the test, and what was the result? He offered the bonds to his own people, and the response was satisfactory. For each $3 wanted $14 was offered. The bonds were sold to our own people at a 3 per cent rate. If a like amount of bonds had been sold under this Administration that was sold under the former Administration, the people would have saved in annual interest alone nearly $4,000,000, showing clearly and conclusively that the policy adopted by Mr. McKinley, as compared with the policy adopted by Mr. Cleveland in the sale of bonds, was in the interests of the people.

In the former National Administration our securities decreased in value. In the present Administration our securities have increased in value. Under the former Administration men were out of employment and were tramping our streets and highways, asking for work which they could not get and begging for bread to keep soul and body together. Soup houses were established at public expense in the large cities, and public buildings and halls were filled with hungry, shivering humanity, who used them for places in which to sleep. In short, we were a nation whose people were in want and whose credit as a nation was being questioned in the markets of the world. I am glad to state that this condition of affairs was changed through the votes of the people, Republicans and Democrats alike, joining in voting for Mr. McKinley for President of the United States.

Our present condition is happily stated by the President in his message to the Fifty-sixth Congress, in which he says:

The country is in a condition of unusual prosperity, of universal good will among the people at home, and in relations of peace and friendship with every government of the world.

Mr. Chairman, you will recall the campaign of 1896 was fought out on two issues—tariff and money, the Republicans contending that the unfortunate conditions of our country were due to a revenue tariff and to the uncertainty of our money standard of value. Our friends upon the other side insisted that the revenue tariff had nothing to do with our then condition, that the tariff was not an issue, and that the existing gold standard of value was the sole cause of our trouble.

The issue as made up between the parties was one of tariff and of money. Many good men believed then and now believe that the real issue was the tariff, while also many good men believed then and now believe that the money question was the real issue. It was owing to these views so held that party lines in many instances were broken, and men who had been lifelong Republicans voted for Mr. Bryan and men who had been lifelong Democrats voted for Mr. McKinley. Perhaps at no time since the commencement of the civil war, when the fate of the nation hung in the balance, was there such a breaking up of party lines. To me it was and is a good sign, for it clearly shows that while the love of party is strong, love of country is stronger. Almost immediately after the induction of Mr. McKinley into office he convened Congress in a special session to provide for a revision of the tariff along Republican lines. He did not wait for Congress to convene under the Constitution, but felt that it was his duty, owing to the unfortunate condition of our people, to at once change, if possible, the condition of affairs. He saw and knew that as a people, industrially speaking, we were in a very unfortunate condition, and likewise he saw that something must be speedily done to relieve the nation from its financial embarrassment.

Seldom in the history of our country were so difficult political problems, in a time of peace, presented to an incoming administration. The Senate was not in political accord with the Executive and the House. The great Speaker, Mr. Reed, was likewise anxious to carry out the wishes of the people, and he refused to name the committees of the House other than a Committee of Ways and Means. While he was much criticised by the public press, he stood firm, and insisted that other legislation must wait, and only such legislation should be entered upon as was then necessary to relieve the people of their unfortunate condition. His conduct in that matter has met with the full approval of the people.

The Dingley bill was prepared and easily passed through the House, and later on became the law of the land. Almost immediately after its passage it began to show its good effect upon the industrial condition of our country. Factories which had long since been closed were opened and work began. Many industrial institutions which were running with light help and on short time were put to work with their full capacity. Many who were seeking work received it. Wages were increased and the great arteries of trade and commerce were set in motion. We no longer hear about the deficit, because we are now once more piling up a surplus. In the last five months our receipts have exceeded our expenditures about $14,000,000.

For the first time in eight years we are purchasing Government bonds and again paying off the public debt. It begins to look now like Republican times again. We no longer hear any discussion of the endless chain because the endless chain never, in Republican times, empties the Treasury, but the endless chain does run and is freighted with the glittering gold, and adds to the surplus of the Treasury and to the financial standing and stability of our country.

We no longer hear any rumors of selling bonds to keep up the gold reserve. Under the operation of the Dingley law, the revenue law, and Republican management the balance of trade has been in our favor, and the payment to us has been made through what our friends like to call the dearest dollar, the glittering gold.

Under the former Administration it was almost a matter of daily occurrence for us to read about the shipment of gold from our country to Europe. The total import of gold for the years 1893, 1894, and 1895 was $128,770,234, and the total export of gold for said period was $251,790,088. Thus it appears that during these three years of Mr. Cleveland's Administration we exported $123,019,854 of gold from our country. Under this Administration it is a matter of almost daily occurrence for us to read of the shipment of gold from Europe to this country. The total import of gold for the years 1897, 1898, and 1899 was $280,866,195. The total export of gold for said period was $92,947,422. Thus it appears that during these three years of Mr. McKinley's Administration we imported $187,918,773 of gold from Europe to this country. We are feeling, through the arteries of trade and commerce, this incoming golden stream.

What better illustration of the industrial and financial uplift of our country can I call your attention to than for me to ask you as honorable, patriotic lovers of your country to look around you and compare its present condition with what it was in 1896?

The other question which was at issue in the campaign of 1896 was the money question. In 1896 about 6,500,000 honest, zealous, patriotic Americans by birth and by choice, under the leadership of Mr. Bryan, voted for the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at a ratio of 16 to 1. In 1896 about 7,000,000 honest, zealous, patriotic Americans by birth and by choice, under the leadership of Mr. McKinley, voted to commit this Government, in its monetary affairs, to the single gold standard. On the one side it was contended that if the single gold standard was adopted there would not be a sufficient volume of money to meet the growth in population and meet the business demands of our people.

It was insisted that gold alone as a standard was not ample in quantity and was not obtainable by us to meet said growth. The distinguished leader of that party, Mr. Bryan, in one of his speeches favorably commented on a statement made by Senator Sherman that we should have at least an annual addition of $24,000,000 in the circulating medium of our country, and asked the question, "What provision has the Republican party made to supply the money we need?" to which he then gave his own answer, "None whatever." We of the other party then insisted that the balance of trade in our favor, under wise Republican legislation and management, and with the coinage of domestic gold, the supply would be ample to meet the requirements made necessary by the growth in population and by the business needs of our people. We have already stated how many millions of gold we have received by import in the last three years. We also are gratified to state that the gold coinage of domestic bullion of the past fiscal year amounts to more than $76,000,000.

When Mr. Bryan made his statement that we ought at least to annually add $24,000,000 to the volume of our currency, we have a right to believe that if we have added that amount to the volume of our currency we have at least met his objection to our inability under the existing gold standard to do so. We do not say that the addition of said amount annually is sufficient to fully meet with his approval. In 1896 the general stock of gold coin, including bullion, in the Treasury was $599,597,964, of date July 1. July 1, 1899, the general stock of gold coin, including bullion, in the Treasury was $963,498,384, being a gain in the three years of $363,900,420, or an average gain of $121,300,140, which was added to our stock of gold. If $24,000,000, in the view of Mr. Bryan, seemed to be a necessary sum to be added to the volume of our currency annually, ought he not to be satisfied if we have added annually to the volume of our currency $121,300,140 of gold?

In 1896 the general stock of money coined or issued July 1 was $2,347,306,006. July 1, 1899, the general stock of money coined or issued was $2,745,350,508. Thus it appears that in the three years, under the Republican administration, there has been added to the general stock of money $398,044,502, or an average of $132,681,500, of which annual average $121,300,140 was in gold, as heretofore stated. This further fact should be borne in mind, that every dollar so added is equal to every other dollar in debt-paying and purchasing power. We pledged ourselves in 1896 that we would maintain the then existing gold standard, which we have done. We pledged ourselves that we would see to it that a piece of paper on which was written the Government promise to pay, as well as a piece of silver which the Government had coined and issued, which was worth about 50 cents on the dollar, should be kept equal to the best dollar possible to be coined either on public or private account, and which the commercial world regards as a gold dollar. This promise we have faithfully kept. How have we kept the promise? How is it possible for the Government to keep a piece of paper and a piece of silver and a piece of gold, the one equal to the other in debt-paying and purchasing power?

The gold is coined on private account. The silver is coined on Government account. The paper is issued part on Government account and part by national banks, who are required, under the law, to place in the hands of the Government ample security to meet the prompt redemption of their notes of issue. The gold in the gold coin is worth 100 cents, whether coined or uncoined. The stamp of the Government on the coin is notice to the public of its weight and fineness. The stamp of the Government neither adds to nor takes from its value. In the case of the silver coin, it is a statement that the Government coined and issued the same, and that, as it has received the full dollar's worth in exchange for it, the Government stands ready and willing to keep said silver equal in debt-paying and purchasing power to a like face coin in gold. Likewise the Government maintains its paper promise to pay. It says to anyone, you can bring to the mint your gold, and if you will bring a sufficient amount of metal, which in the market is worth 100 cents, we will coin and stamp it, and you can put it in circulation as money.

It does not say that anyone can come to the mints of the United States with a piece of silver metal worth 50 cents and have the Government coin and stamp it and allow the owner thereof to circulate it as money having equal debt-paying and purchasing power with a gold coin worth in the market twice as much as the silver piece of coin. The Government says, if necessary, it will go into the market and buy the silver, for instance, $100 worth, coin it into $200 worth of silver, and make the profit for the benefit of the people.

It further says that if it buy of the people stores or provisions, or pays any of its officers, soldiers, and employees, or pays to the widows and orphans of the soldiers who have defended its honor and its flag, at home or abroad, any money, that it shall see to it that he or she gets value received, and that every dollar which is thus paid out shall be equal to the best dollar in the world. In other words, the Government says it will control the issue of money and will keep in its own hands the power and ability to see to it that every dollar shall be equal to every other dollar. In order to keep its paper promises to pay equal and interchangeable with gold, like a prudent and successful business man, it has deposited in the Treasury of the United States and its branches $100,000,000 in gold, so that anyone who has any of its paper promises to pay, and has any doubt about the financial stability of its promises to pay being redeemed in gold, can go at any time and exchange said promises to pay for gold. Likewise, a prudent business man keeps to his credit in the bank money sufficient to honor the checks that he may issue.

The check is not payment, but an order for payment. The prudent man would not allow Tom, Dick, and Harry to draw checks against him without leave and limit. Neither will the Government allow the silver-mine owner without limit to issue silver money and hold the Government responsible for keeping that money equal, in debt-paying and purchasing power, with gold. By limiting the amount of paper money, and by limiting the amount of the issue of silver, the Government has it within its power to keep all of its money equal and interchangeable. It is the duty of the Government to see to it that its people has in circulation the best of money, and that it keeps that money of such kind and character that each of every kind in circulation, whether at home or abroad, is equal to the best. It can not afford to be dishonest to its own people, nor to the people of the world.

The strength of government paper is no stronger than the strength of the government which issues it. The currency issued by the Southern Confederacy is worthless. The currency issued by the United States has been kept equal to gold, but at a great expense to the Government that issued it. The boys of '61 were paid in Government promises to pay which were worth about 50 cents on the dollar. The boys of '98 carried in their hands the lamp of liberty, education, civilization, and our home people who bought the bonds paid to the boys a dollar worth 100 cents the world around. We pledged ourselves that without extra cost to the people we would maintain the gold reserve. This pledge we have kept. We pledged ourselves that we would make our country's credit equal to the credit of any country in the world. This pledge we have kept.

Mr. Chairman, as a result of the elections in 1898, the party to which we belong has been placed in full and complete control in the lawmaking departments of the Government. We have great opportunities and great responsibilities. At the very first chance we have of successfully legislating upon the question of the standard of value, we cheerfully proceed to carry out the wishes of the people as expressed at the ballot box. We now have for consideration a measure which will establish by law the single gold standard. From 1792 to 1873 we had a double standard, one of gold and one of silver, at prescribed ratios. During said period of time the ratio between the two standards was changed twice, thereby proving that we had an alternating but not a double standard. In 1873, by the coinage act, the gold one-dollar piece was made the unit of value. Since said time there has been silver legislation which has tended toward creating a silver standard of value.

The object and purpose of this bill is to set at rest all questions as to the existing legal unit of value in this country and to remove all doubt in relation thereto. There must be some standard of value. The civilized world has determined that the standard shall be gold. For more than a quarter of a century we have been acting upon the assumption that gold is the standard of value. This bill in unmistakable terms recognizes the gold standard. This bill also makes all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money now existing or hereafter to be entered into and all United States notes issued under the law of July 11, 1890, payable in gold. It does not affect the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollars. On more than one occasion the Government has solemnly declared its intention and fixed purpose to preserve at all times the parity of gold and silver in the currency of the nation. It has kept them at a parity.

The passage of this measure will not cast any extra burden upon the Government. It will make clear the manner of the payment of the Government's interest-bearing obligations. It will settle beyond the possibility of a doubt the credit of the country at home and abroad. It will make it possible to easily refund at a lower rate of interest the interest-bearing obligations of the Government. It will induce the surplus capital of the world to come here in order to find a safe and profitable investment. As the rate of the interest-bearing obligations of the Government is lowered so will the rate of interest be lowered to the debtor throughout the country. Foreign capital will compete with foreign capital in seeking to invest in American securities at a low rate of interest when the doubt and uncertainty of the kind of money in which they are to be repaid is entirely removed, and when it is made certain by law that gold is the standard unit of value in our country.

This measure also creates in the Treasury Department a division of issue and redemption. In this division of issue and redemption is set apart gold and silver for the purpose of maintaining the parity of our currency. This is a wise provision, because it separates the fiscal operations of the Treasury from its issue and redemption operations. It also clothes the Secretary with ample power to maintain said issue and redemption fund, and authorizes him to sell gold-bearing bonds, if necessary, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, to maintain said reserve fund. This provision of the law so divides the operation of the Treasury Department that the people can readily see and understand whether bonds are sold to maintain the gold reserve or whether they are sold under the guise of maintaining the gold reserve and the money resulting from the sale is used to pay the running expenses of the Government on account of deficient revenues.

It is generally believed that the expenditures exceeded the receipts during Mr. Cleveland's last Administration and that money realized from his bond sales was diverted from the reserve fund into paying the current expenses of the Government. It appears that the revenues, exclusive of postal, for the years 1893, 1894, and 1895 were $996,931,723. It also appears that the expenditures, exclusive of postal, principal of debt, and premium for said three years were $1,167,198,533. It also appears that the expenditures for said three years exceeded the revenues by the sum of $110,266,810. It may be that a portion of the money realized by the bond sale in 1894-95 was used to meet this deficiency and the balance used to keep up the gold reserve.

The passage of this provision of the bill now under consideration so segregates the accounts in the Treasury that there can be no question about the purpose for which bonds may be issued and sold. There is also a provision in the bill to the effect that when the United States notes known as greenbacks and the Treasury notes are exchanged for gold the said notes so exchanged shall not be withdrawn except in exchange for an equivalent amount of gold.

This will stop what is familiarly known as the endless chain. This provision is in accordance with the recommendation of the President in his last and previous messages to Congress. It is objected by some that this provision impounds the greenbacks and Treasury notes and has a tendency to contract the currency. The objection is not tenable for the reason that the gold is exchanged for the greenbacks or the greenbacks are exchanged for the gold. While one is in circulation the other is not in circulation. Under the present law greenbacks are procured by gold speculators and presented to the Treasury and gold paid out in exchange for them.

It appears that it has been the practice to pay out these greenbacks so taken in in the current affairs of the Government by its officers. Thereupon these same greenbacks so paid out are again obtained by the gold speculators and again presented to the Treasury and gold demanded in exchange. So the process continues until the gold reserve is reduced below $100,000,000 to the danger point, and thereupon a bond sale is ordered to maintain the gold reserve. This very process took place during Mr. Cleveland's Administration, and, to his credit be it said, he manfully and courageously maintained the gold reserve by the sale of bonds. The fault was in the law and the operations thereunder, and was not due to him.

We propose by this provision of the bill to put it beyond the possibility of the gold speculators to again put in operation the endless chain and to put it beyond the power of Government officials unwittingly to aid them in their attack upon the gold reserve. We do not intend to allow noninterest-bearing obligations, like the greenback and the Treasury note, to be so used as to compel the Government to provide gold for its redemption by creating an interest-bearing debt. There is ample money in the Treasury other than greenbacks and Treasury notes which can be paid out by the Government officials to meet the current expenses. The payments can be made in gold and silver.

I venture to predict that the present condition will obtain in a greater degree when this provision becomes law, and that is that gold is being presented to the Treasury and greenbacks and Treasury notes and silver dollars are asked for in exchange. It was asserted prior to 1879, when we resumed specie payment, that there would not be sufficient specie in the country to redeem the greenbacks when presented. This prediction did not come true. Likewise I do not believe that there will be any great demand by the holders of greenbacks and Treasury notes to exchange them for gold in case this provision of the bill becomes a law. If such be true, then there will be no impounding of greenbacks to any extent whatever, and another financial ghost which appears to frighten some of our friends upon the other side will vanish into thin air.

I am informed that there have been many requests made to the Secretary of the Treasury during the present year asking him to exchange greenbacks, Treasury notes, silver certificates, and silver dollars for gold, and that he has in many instances declined the proffered offer. It appears that in 1895-96 legal-tender notes were redeemed in gold to the amount of $276,010,154. It also appears that in the years 1898-99 legal-tender notes were redeemed in gold to the amount of $50,049,220. These two statements conclusively show the confidence the public had in the financial ability of the different Administrations.

There is also a wise provision in this bill allowing banks to issue circulation to the par value of the bonds deposited by them under the law. The purpose of this provision is to enlarge the circulation. It is estimated that this provision, if enacted into law, will add to the circulation about $100,000,000, provided, however, that the tax is taken off of the circulation, as is recommended by this proposed bill. It is not expected that this provision will meet with the approval of our friends who are unalterably opposed to the entire national banking act. It is believed that it will meet with the approval of the people of our country who approve of the national banking system and who prefer to have a paper currency as good as gold, rather than to have the wild-cat currency once in circulation in our country. It may be contended by some that when the tax is taken off of the circulation, the bonds will be to that extent enhanced in value. This is largely a matter of speculation, but it is believed by others that the bond will not be enhanced in value. It may be that when this measure goes to the Senate, a refunding bond provision may be inserted as an amendment; and if so, this objection to the enhancement of the bond will thereby be overcome.

The purpose of this provision is to give elasticity to our currency, and we have every reason to believe that it will so act. There is a provision in this bill which taxes the capital surplus and undivided profits of national banks. The purpose of this provision is twofold: First, to create a fund for the purpose of paying for the supervision of the Government over national banks and incidentally for revenue, and second, to relieve the smaller banks of the country from the burden of the circulation tax and to equalize among the national banks, great and small, the expense incident to Government supervision. By this transfer of tax the Government is the gainer and not the loser from a revenue standpoint. So that the charge, if made, that this provision of this bill is for the benefit of the banks and not for the benefit of the people is not true in fact. There is also another wise provision in this bill allowing banks with a capital of $25,000 to be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 2,000 inhabitants. This provision allows the smaller villages and, in fact, the country districts to organize banks and to supply themselves with bank circulating notes. It is believed that this provision will work to the great advantage and betterment of the country. [Applause.]

This bill will be, when enacted into law, of incalculable benefit to our country. It is in line with our banking system; it is in line with our promises to maintain the existing gold standard. In fact, it gives vitality to that promise by putting it into the shape of law. If we are right in our contention as to the standard unit of value, we will enact it into law, and then it can be shown by experience what its working will be. Those of you who differ with us upon this very important question ought to welcome, gladly, our action in this matter; because if we are wrong in our contention, the country will be quick to realize it and they will turn to you with your views upon this question for relief. We feel confident that we are right. We are ready now to go on record upon this question and enact this measure into law. We hold ourselves responsible to the American people for our action. We believe that you are equally earnest and honest in your convictions upon this question and, with us, want to do what is best for our common country. We are in the majority in this Congress. We are responsible for legislation. We cheerfully assume the responsibility. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the party to which we belong will stand by the President in his Philippine policy and will uphold his military arm as long as the insurrection continues in those islands because, under the Constitution, it is his duty, as well as ours, to uphold the sovereignty of the United States in those distant islands as in all other places where our flag rightfully floats. As a party we stand by the policy of protection to home industry and of honest money with which to pay honest earnings. As a party we stand, now as ever, for the reduction of taxes, as fast as our national obligations will permit. We stand for more ships as the best conservators of peace. We stand for public improvements that will aid and cheapen transportation and promote the public service.

We favor legislation that will increase our merchant marine, so that American goods going abroad and foreign goods coming to our country may be carried in American vessels under the American flag. We favor fortifications and coast defenses. We favor a regular army large enough to maintain law and order wherever our flag rightfully floats. We believe in granting liberal pensions to the soldiers and sailors of '61 and '98 and to their widows and orphans. We stand for the enactment of the eight-hour law in Government works. We stand for the dollar which contains its intrinsic value and which is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. [Loud applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I approach the consideration of the pending bill conscious of the importance and gravity of the subject with which it deals and of my inability to do justice to a subject so important without more ample time for preparation than the Committee on Rules and the majority in this Chamber have seen fit to accord.

Up to this time the friends of the measure who have addressed the House have hardly referred to the bill at all. They have revamped campaign speeches, made up mostly of platitudes invented by Mr. Cleveland and Bourke Cockran, and bragged immoderately on themselves and their party, but not one of them has gone into details; not one of them has pointed out precisely how this bill is to cure the defects in our financial system. I believe that if enacted into a law it will inevitably aggravate these evils. I believe that instead of preventing panics it will breed them.

In my opinion, under normal conditions it will severely limit the volume of currency, compelling men of business to rely too largely upon bank credits as a means of exchange, and that under abnormal conditions, in periods of depression, caused, for instance, by crop failures, diminished exports, and an adverse balance of trade, resulting in gold exports, it expressly provides for the contraction of the currency, thereby insuring fourfold contraction of bank credits. Thus money is to be made most scarce and credit most difficult to obtain when money and credit are most urgently needed.

Several gentlemen have justified the arbitrary methods resorted to by the friends of the bill in order to rush it through the House, without allowing time for preparation for its discussion or opportunity to amend it, on the theory that it only establishes the gold standard, and that since the question at issue between gold monometallists and the advocates of bimetallism have been the subject of almost constant discussion for years, time for preparation for its discussion is unnecessary.

It is true the bill fastens the gold standard upon the country, and this, in my opinion, is sufficient to damn it; but this is not its only provision.

It largely increases the privileges and powers of national banks. It places them in supreme control of the money supply.

It empowers them to expand and contract the volume of currency at pleasure, thereby placing the business of the country at their mercy.

It allows them to keep token money as reserves and compels the Government to assume the burden of the ultimate redemption of their notes.

It creates in this country a national bankers' oligarchy, invested with the sovereign power of furnishing the money of commerce and regulating the volume thereof, so that, in addition to the provisions declaring gold the only money of final payment, this bill contains provisions conferring such extraordinary powers upon private corporations and so dangerous to all classes of society that it deserves only the support of the representatives of the national banks.

Mr. Chairman, let us analyze this bill and ascertain precisely what changes it makes in existing laws. Its friends contend that it only establishes the gold standard. Let us compare its provisions with the coinage laws and other financial legislation now on the statute books and see whether this is true or not.

The bill under consideration reenacts the law of 1873, adding—what may have been viewed as a remarkable discovery by its author—that a dollar is one-tenth part of a ten-dollar gold piece. This grotesque and ludicrous feature will, I think, be generally regarded as a novelty, but it adds nothing to the law it reenacts.

The law of 1873 in so far as it made gold the only money of final payment was abrogated by the Bland-Allison law of 1878, which, in the language of its title, "restored the legal-tender character of the silver dollar." That is, the silver dollar was placed on an equality with the gold dollar as a legal tender for debts.

Before the enactment of the law of 1873 the standard dollar was made of silver, but the debtor might discharge his obligation with gold—that is, the silver dollar was the standard dollar, but gold was, equally with silver, a legal tender.

This was bimetalism.

The law of 1873 made gold a legal tender for any amount and silver a legal tender for not exceeding $10.

For five years it was unquestionably the law of the land, and during that period the single gold standard was a legal institution of this country; and while there is truth in the charge that the country has, since 1878, been subjected to all its evils, this has been done by the lawless acts and policies of the Treasury Department and not by virtue of any statute.

During the five years in which, under the law of 1873, the single gold standard was legal it was practically inoperative, for only paper currency was in use and the current debts of the period were paid in greenbacks.

By the enactment of the Bland-Allison law in 1878 the silver dollar was again made the equal of the gold dollar as money of ultimate redemption.

Thereafter all obligations, public and private, "except where expressly stipulated in the contract," might be paid in either gold or silver, at the option of the creditor.

So that indisputably the Bland-Allison law restored bimetalism.

Shortly after the passage of the Bland-Allison law the friends of the bondholders in the United States Senate strongly insisted that notwithstanding the restoration of bimetalism all Government obligations were payable in gold, and this called forth the adoption of the Stanley Matthews resolution, which declared by an overwhelming majority of both Houses of Congress that Government obligations, including all outstanding bonds, are payable in silver dollars or gold dollars, at the option of the Government.

This was notice to all the world that debts, public and private, may be fully and legally discharged by the payment of silver dollars.

In the international monetary conference of 1881 Mr. Howe, one of our delegates, reminded the high dignitaries there present, representing all the great powers of Christendom, that under the laws of the United States and the contract the Government of the United States had and would exercise this option, and nobody demurred.

Thenceforward until the campaign of 1896 the stock argument of Republicans against free coinage was that we had bimetalism—the option to pay debts in either gold or silver—and that the Government was providing the means of enjoying its benefits by constant additions to the volume of silver money.

I venture the assertion that there is not a gentleman on the Republican side of this Chamber who has not made this argument. It was used constantly by Republican newspapers for nearly twenty years.

While not a weighty argument against the resumption of unlimited coinage, it was a correct statement of the law of the land. I contend now, as Republicans have heretofore contended, that the gold standard is not now and, except during the years intervening between the enactment of the coinage law of 1873 and the enactment of the Bland-Allison law, never has been a legal institution in the United States.

It is true that, in defiance of the statutes, the Treasury Department has, for twenty years, treated the silver dollar as a mere token and the gold dollar as the only full legal-tender coin of the country, but bimetalism—the use of gold and silver as money of ultimate payment—has had the sanction of legislation from the foundation of the Government down to this hour.

And yet in the course of this debate gentlemen have insisted that the single gold standard has existed in this country ever since 1834. In that year and again in 1837 the coinage law was amended so as to reduce the weight of gold coin sufficiently to change the coinage ratio of the metals from 15 to 1—the ratio provided by the statute of 1789—to 16 to 1.

This was the only change made in the statute. The gold pieces were made lighter. The silver dollar remained the standard dollar until 1873. Monometallism was not dreamed of. Could demagogism go farther or sink lower than to pretend that the statute of 1834 made any material change in the monetary system of this country?

And yet this argument has been used by men of national prominence.

In fruitless efforts to justify his apostasy and treason to his party and his country, Carlisle, if memory serves me well, invented it, as he did nearly all the other makeshifts that have since been used as arguments by Republican stump speakers.

Why, Mr. Chairman, no Republican has addressed the House without chewing over the platitudes coined by Cleveland and Carlisle during the brief period in which they earned the execration of their countrymen.

Carlisle knew, and gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber ought to know, that the coinage law of 1834 was intended to correct a mistake made by the framers of our first coinage law. It had no other object. The ratio had been fixed at 15 to 1. The world's ratio was 15½ to 1. This was an overvaluation of silver, an undervaluation of gold; hence only silver entered the channels of circulation. Gold went to other countries, where its valuation for money purposes was higher. To obviate this the amendment of the coinage law of 1834 should have made the ratio 15½ to 1, the world's ratio, but our lawmakers made another mistake. They fixed the ratio at 16 to 1, with the inevitable consequence that thereafter gold, on account of its undervaluation, took the place of silver in our circulation. Bullion dealers could make a profit of about 3 per cent by exporting American silver coined at the ratio of 16 to 1 to countries where it was admitted to the mints at a ratio of 15½ to 1.

Mr. Chairman, the accuracy of this statement of the purpose, intention, and effect of the laws of 1834 and 1837 can not be called in question, and yet advocates of the gold standard have the audacity to claim that the statute of 1834 established the single gold standard in the United States.

Carlisle, the debauched Iscariot whose name has become synonymous with treason and dishonor, invented it, and from the day of its first utterance it has occupied a conspicuous place in Republican campaign literature.

Even more remarkable is the assertion that in 1833 an amendment to the coinage laws by which the weight of subsidiary coin was materially reduced abolished bimetalism in the United States. A queer chapter of history furnishes an explanation of that amendment to our coinage laws. During the four or five preceding years the movement of silver to foreign countries had been going forward at an accelerated rate. The movement had reached alarming proportions. A dearth of small change seriously inconvenienced men of business. To stop this drain and for no other purpose the coinage law was amended so as to reduce the weight of subsidiary silver.

European countries suffered similarly. Like the United States, they were losing full weight silver coin.

Presently there came an explanation of what was regarded as a phenomenon. When, in 1848, England broke through the Chinese wall of exclusion by negotiating the first treaty of commerce entered into with the Celestials, it was found that in that land of mysteries gold and silver were interchangeable at the rate of 6 to 1. This opened up a profitable field to the bullion dealer. By sending silver to China and exchanging it for gold they netted a profit of about 60 per cent. At that period the silver mines were not very productive, and the cash drawers of Christendom were ransacked in quest of full-weight silver coin, which speedily found its way to the Orient. I may remark, in passing, that the amendment of our coinage laws in 1853 took place after the cause of silver exportation had disappeared. The Chinaman had ascertained the true value of his gold, and the traffic which had resulted in serious inconvenience to Europe and America had ceased. Nevertheless, after its cessation considerable demands from European countries, who sought to replenish their stocks of silver, occasioned the export of large quantities of our silver coinage until the amendment of 1853 put a stop to it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have fully stated the occasion and the purpose of an amendment of a legislative enactment which did not even squint at a change in our financial system. Is it not strange that gentlemen holding exalted places in the Government in dealing with a matter so vital to the people, should have the audacity to assert that in 1853 the single gold standard was established in the United States?

The amendment of 1853 did not deprive either silver or gold of the right of free access to the mints nor curtail the legal-tender quality of either metal. The law of 1789 gave to the debtor the legal right to discharge his obligation in either gold or silver at his option, and that feature of the law remained unchanged until the passage of the demonetization act of 1873. Neither in 1834 nor in 1837 nor in 1853 did anyone dream of depriving debtors of this right, and yet again, imitating the Gamaliel at whose feet they have learned the catechism of gold monometallism—again imitating Mr. Carlisle and revamping his utterances—Republicans have declared on this floor that a law enacted to meet peculiar exigencies of commerce, enacted without discussion or the proposal of any such change, established the gold standard in this country.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The time allotted to me is slipping away, and I can not yield to interruptions.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Bennett, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who reported that bill, said distinctly that the purpose of it was to establish the gold standard.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Your discovery is one that I would like to have verified.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I can verify it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from Iowa seems disposed to discuss substantial things to-day. Such a course would have been well received yesterday when he contented himself with splendid and unrivaled oratory. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will produce the record.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will not yield now.

Mr. LENTZ. There were only two men on the floor at that time who said that anything of the kind was ever considered.

Mr. McCLEARY. But there were two.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman permit me to refer to the record?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I object to further interruptions.

I again assert that neither silver nor gold was deprived of legal-tender power and the right of free and unlimited coinage by the amendment of 1853. The silver dollar remained the standard as it had been from the foundation of the Government. The law was amended at a time when Europe was busily engaged in discussing the adoption of silver monometallism, but when in no country under the sun was there a movement in favor of adopting gold monometallism. This country had its monometallists at that period, but they were silver monometallists. They had studied Chevalier and the writings of an English economist and were convinced that the latter was right in asserting that gold would soon be only fit for the dustpan.

Then, as now, New England corporations were the head and front of the scarce-money contingent. Water-power companies down East, in order to shield themselves against a deluge of cheap gold money, stipulated in leases that so many ounces of fine silver, instead of so many dollars, should be paid to them by their customers for water-power privileges.

Mr. Chairman, if in that period money-lending corporations had been as numerous and powerful as they are now, the movement in favor of the demonetization of gold which succeeded in Germany, Holland, and Austria would have extended to the United States; but the truth is that prior to 1873 no movement of the kind was ever heard of in American politics, and the contention that almost immaterial amendments of the coinage laws, dealing solely with details, and in no way affecting the financial system of the country, has any relation whatever to the question under discussion seems to me stupid and preposterous.

Mr. Chairman, I declare that now and here for the first time the Congress has under discussion a bill which effectually and entirely eliminates the silver dollar as money of ultimate payment, and thereby definitively establishes the single gold standard.

Here, for the first time, the leaders of the Republican party boldly doff the mask.

I do not care to thrash over the history of the passage of the coinage law of 1873 further than to state that at the time of its passage there was no discussion of the great question which has since so largely occupied the time of civilized nations. For twelve years prior to its passage no specie had circulated in the United States, and none did circulate here until five years later. Nobody was thinking about the coinage laws. The men of business who were then 30 years of age or less had never known anything but a paper currency, and as for the members of this House and of the Senate, it is a well-established fact that they regarded the bill as a measure dealing with administrative details, and in no way vitally affecting our monetary system.

Divers and sundry financial measures have heretofore been brought forward. Scores have been introduced in this and the other branch of Congress, but now for the first time a bill, favorably reported by a committee after full examination, unequivocally committing the United States to the gold standard, is the subject of debate in this House.

Under the provisions of this bill the silver dollar and the greenbacks are to remain a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, just as greenbacks are, but all forms of currency, including silver dollars and silver certificates, are made redeemable in gold.

Henceforth the silver dollar, now legally the equal of the gold dollar as money of ultimate payment, is to be only a token, differing in no respect from the greenback. It is to lose its character as redemption money and become itself redeemable in gold.

It is the intention of the authors of this bill to forever close the door against bimetalism in the United States.

A system denounced, when not ignored, by the platforms of all political parties, from 1873, down to this hour, is about to be forced upon the country; and this crime, blacker even than the infamy of 1873, is to be committed by the representatives of a party that has never avowed such a purpose, but on the contrary stands solemnly pledged to a contrary policy.

Mr. Chairman, in my State, and in yours, in 1896, the Republicans contended that they, and not the Democrats were the true friends of bimetalism. They declared that Mr. McKinley, if elected, would maintain the gold standard as the surest and, in fact, the only way of securing bimetalism, and not with a view to its ultimate and irrevocable adoption. I hazard nothing in saying that in all the region lying west of the Alleghenies, this was the position of the Republicans in the only national campaign in which political parties have divided upon this question.

When Grover Cleveland began his crusade against silver, Republican orators in all parts of the country denounced him as an enemy of bimetalism. I have no doubt that scores of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber delivered speeches denouncing his policy to cheering multitudes of Republicans.

Mr. Chairman, here is a sample of the Republican oratory of that period. It is an extract from a speech delivered by William McKinley, at Toledo, Ohio, February, 1891:

During all of Grover Cleveland's years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of your precious metals—one of our own products—discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored even before his inauguration into office to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards and to the end of his Administration persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and to demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce, and therefore dear. He would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else—money the master, everything else the servant. He was not thinking of "the poor" then. He had left their side. He was not standing forth in their defense. Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money. The sponsor and promoter of those professing to stand guard over the welfare of the poor and lowly. Was there ever more inconsistency or reckless assumption?

This speech was extensively used in 1896 to convince Republicans that, if elected, the Republican nominee would not sanction the policy of Cleveland and follow in his footsteps, but would labor steadfastly for the restoration of bimetalism.

Mr. McKinley was right. The merciless bankers' oligarchy back of this measure then, and through whose influence it is now about to be made the law of the land, are "determined to demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce, and therefore dear."

They would "increase the value of money and diminish the value of everything else."

They would make "money the master, everything else the servant."

Mr. Chairman, when these bitter words were poured out upon the head of Mr. Cleveland, when thousands of Republican orators were hurling similar verbal thunderbolts at the corpulent stuffed prophet who pointed out the path which is now leading them to dishonor, who would have dared to predict that seven years after the philippic I have read was delivered, McKinley as President and a Republican Congress would become the willing tools of the national bankers' trust and force upon the statute book a law fastening upon the country the policy they so fervently denounced?

It must not be supposed, however, Mr. Chairman, that this law imposes the hardships of the gold standard upon all alike. It exempts national banks from the necessity of keeping their reserves in gold and considerably loads the Government with that responsibility. Section 3 of the bill provides for a gold reserve of $150,000,000, and in order to keep it intact authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds for its replenishment. Silver dollars, silver certificates, greenbacks, and Treasury notes are made sight drafts against this gold reserve, which thus becomes the foundation upon which is to stand the vast pyramid of credit represented by all forms of currency, including national bank notes. The banks may keep their reserves in Treasury notes, silver certificates, or silver dollars. The Government, their gratuitous agent, redeems these notes on demand out of this redemption fund. Thus, if the exigencies of business necessitate gold exports, or an opportunity to make profits by shipping gold out of the country arises, all bullion dealers have to do is to appear at the Treasury or at the subtreasury maintained for their benefit in New York and present for redemption in gold Treasury notes, greenbacks, silver certificates, or silver dollars—"any old thing" that happens to be in their vaults—and the gold will be forthcoming; and if necessary they can convert national-bank notes into sight drafts on the Treasury payable in gold.

Think of it, gentlemen! We are to have the gold standard, but our bank reserves are to be kept in token money.

The existing law requires national banks to keep on deposit in the Treasury a 5 per cent redemption fund, and when it is impaired they must make good the deficiency.

And the note holder has no cause of complaint, for having received from one Treasury official in redemption of a national-bank note silver dollars—henceforth mere tokens, or greenbacks—he may step over to the adjacent wicket and exchange the tokens for gold.

We are to have the gold standard for the people; gold is to measure the value of their property and be the harsh standard for the measurement of all debts; but for the ultimate redemption of national-bank notes the Government is to maintain perpetually a gold reserve of $150,000,000.

And, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion this is the most atrocious and indefensible feature of this miserable measure. Why, only a short time ago the wise men who concocted this monstrosity were fully convinced that if somehow the endless chain could be broken the financial problem would be solved. They said that the Government was in the banking business; that it was compelled to maintain a gold reserve with which to redeem the greenbacks; that then the greenbacks had to be paid out again, and so had to be redeemed over and over again, and that as long as this system was adhered to the country might expect to suffer occasionally and for protracted periods afflictions such as came upon us in 1893 and continued until 1898.

And what remedy did they propose? Why, contraction and enlargement of the privileges of the national banks, of course.

They demanded the retirement of the greenbacks and Treasury notes and the abolishment of the gold reserve. This, they said, would take the Government out of the banking business.

For three years this was the programme urged upon the country by the gold monometallists.

And what has it all simmered down to? A bill which adds to the greenbacks and Treasury notes, which formed the endless chain they have heretofore said ought to be abolished, the silver dollars, the silver certificates, and, as I have shown conclusively, the national-bank notes! It increases the gold reserve to $150,000,000, makes it a permanent institution, and in case of its impairment authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds for its replenishment!

And this bill is the offering of the same tinkers who aforetime declared that the salvation of the country depended upon abolishing the gold reserve and taking the Government out of the banking business.

Mr. Chairman, having stated briefly some of the benefits that will accrue to the national banks under this bill, I will now give my views as to how it will affect the everyday business of the masses of the people. The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have not discussed this phase of the subject. They make a great ado about the business revival which, through dispensations of Providence and in spite of atrocious Governmental policies, came just in time to save the farmers, shopkeepers, mechanics, and laborers of this country from utter despair, and seem to think that this will be taken as proof conclusive that this bill is precisely what the country needs. It seems never to occur to them that a single turn of fortune's wheel may bring on adversity. Hard times may and unfortunately will come again. Experience has convinced the country that what it needs is such a change in the banking laws as will prevent severe contraction of the volume of money when credit is withdrawn and only money will save thousands from sinking from affluence to beggary.

Mr. Chairman, periods of depression, with creditors clamoring for payment, with debtors eager to sell property at any price, with gold flowing out of instead of into the country, call for enlargement instead of diminution in the volume of money. Will this bill furnish it?

Laying aside for the moment differences of opinion as to the coinage law and keeping in view only features of the measure which relate to the paper currency, we should be sure that this enactment will cure instead of breeding panics before giving it approval. I am thoroughly convinced that it will operate to contract the volume of money when money is most earnestly needed. Who ever heard of banks expanding note issues or any other form of credit during a panic?

I believe that the only cure for a stringency in the money market is more money, and if this position be correct, then this bill is about the worst that could have been devised.

Under its provisions currency, when redeemed in gold, must remain under lock and key, and the gold thus abstracted from the Treasury will be sent out of the country. National-bank notes presented for redemption by the Treasury raiders will be redeemed in gold, or, what amounts to the same thing, in greenbacks or silver, which can be forthwith "exchanged" for gold. So that by this bill Treasury raiding is simplified.

Under existing statutes, in order to raid the gold reserve bullion dealers have been compelled to obtain and present greenbacks or Treasury notes. Under the pending measure this is unnecessary. When gold is wanted for export, any and every thing goes, and if the gold reserve be treasured upon the Secretary of the Treasury must sell bonds and lay in a fresh supply.

Mr. Chairman, the taxpayers have not forgotten what it cost the Government to furnish to the bullion dealers of New York the large sums of gold sent abroad during 1893, 1894, and 1895 in payment of heavy adverse balances of trade due to foreign creditors.

When, by a conspiracy entered into by the President of the United States and his Secretary of the Treasury and the national bankers of New York, the great panic of 1893-94 was improvised as an "object lesson," for the purpose of influencing legislation, we had an illustration of what may be expected from the operation of this law. There occurred a sudden and enormous contraction of available currency at a time when nothing but money would stay the ravages of the storm. It was the work of the bankers' syndicate. Forced liquidation compelled the sacrifice of property. Everywhere thousands offered to sell, but for want of money few could buy.

The country banks did everything in their power to relieve the situation, but the banks of the great metropolitan cities, even when willing to extend accommodations, used their means to prop up the value of bonds and stocks, while the commerce and trade of a continent was withering and dying for want of money.

Exceedingly low prices were the inevitable consequence. This diminished the exchange value of our exports enormously and correspondingly increased the balance of trade against us. Gold was exported in increasing quantities.

Under similar conditions, do not gentlemen know this bill would fail utterly to meet the requirements of the country?

Foreign governments discourage in every manner possible exports of specie. The plan of the American gold monometallist is to make the Treasury of the United States an auxiliary of the business. They have done this in the past without authority or law. This bill makes it a compulsory duty.

In 1893-94 the New York bankers who make a specialty of exporting bullion reaped a golden harvest at the expense of the American people. They solicited the business, applied to the Treasury for the necessary gold to meet their requirements, and it was forthcoming, in exchange for greenbacks, which, under the law, could have been redeemed in silver, and the only consequence would have been a premium on London exchange.

Why, Mr. Chairman, right now the Bank of France is protecting its gold reserve by recourse to the means I have here pointed out. To have resorted to it in 1893 and 1894 would have entailed slight hardship upon the small number of persons and corporations owing balances abroad, but it would have mitigated the violence of a financial storm which brought ruin to thousands.

I know it is contended that the bullion dealers raided the gold reserve because they lacked confidence in the ability of the Government to redeem its obligations in gold, but the truth is they were money merchants, bullion dealers, carrying on the business because it is profitable. They made enormous profits and the taxpayers footed the bills. All they had to do was to call on the Federal Treasury, through the New York banks, for such sums as they desired and it was handed over. It was shipped out of the country, and next day the New York papers pointed to the transaction as evidence that confidence was lacking in the ability of the Government to pay its debts in gold.

Thus Ikellheimer made money, and Cleveland's "object lesson" was kept constantly before the country. When the gold reserve became depleted, to replenish it bonds were sold, and the raiders went to work again. My recollection is that two hundred and sixty-two millions was thus added to the interest-bearing debt, and not the least infamous phase of this scandalous proceeding was that out of these bond deals the conspirators who brought on the panic made princely fortunes. The bonds were sold at prices so low that even Goldbug papers, that justified their sale and defended the financial policy of the Administration, denounced the proceeding as infamous.

And, Mr. Chairman, in this connection I direct the attention of the gentlemen who are about to make these bonds, as well as all others, payable in gold to some pertinent facts with which the people are entirely familiar. With the exception of the $262,000,000 issued during Mr. Cleveland's Administration, the Government bonds outstanding are a legacy of the civil war. They represent greenbacks worth in specie less than 50 cents on the dollar. By the passage of the "credit-strengthening act," making them payable in coin, their value was doubled. By the passage of this act you are about to make the bondholders another present of probably $200,000,000.

Do gentlemen on the other side of the House demand proof in support of this statement? It is found in the history of Mr. Carlisle's unsavory back-room bond deals. Mr. Cleveland strenuously urged the passage of a law conferring upon the Secretary of the Treasury authority to sell gold-bearing bonds to replenish the gold reserve, and as an argument in favor of the enactment of the measure cited the fact that the coterie of favorites who in those days thrived so splendidly on the profits of back-room deals with his Secretary of the Treasury would pay higher figures, by which, on an issue of $62,000,000, $16,000,000 would be saved to the Government if only the magic word "gold" could be written in the contract. Congress refused to comply with his request and the purchasers paid the lower price for bonds payable in coin.

And now, gentlemen, you propose to pass a bill which makes all Government bonds—those representing greenbacks, worth less than 50 cents on the dollar when the loan was made, and the bonds issued by Mr. Cleveland under the circumstances I have detailed—payable in gold.

Upon what theory do you justify this feature of the bill? Do you expect to satisfy your constituents by the use of lofty platitudes and resounding periods about "sound money" and "the best money" and "dollars of equal value" and the "necessity of maintaining the parity?"

Do you expect to win your constituents' approval of this act of reckless profligacy by lauding yourselves as guardians of the credit and honor of the country?

You are about to place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury power to issue gold bonds, so that in case of its depletion he can replenish the gold reserve. Thus a single officer of the Government is to have power to lay upon this and coming generations ever-increasing burdens of taxation.

Mr. Carlisle carried on the back-room bond deals, which his countrymen have neither forgotten nor forgiven, under a statute long regarded as obsolete, a statute enacted for a particular purpose many years ago and which had not been thought of for twenty years. Now, instead of repealing that law you are about to enact one vesting permanently in the Secretary of the Treasury a power which in the past has been shamefully abused and which henceforth may be resorted to whenever the "friends of the Administration" see fit to raid the gold reserve and compel an issue of bonds to replenish it.

Mr. Chairman, without unduly extending my remarks I can not discuss at greater length the details of this bill. Viewed in its entirety the measure is a clumsy effort to establish the English system of finance in the United States. It establishes the gold standard, but does not require the banks to redeem their notes in gold. In England 170 banks of issue, called there provincial banks, may redeem their notes in Bank of England notes, and ultimate redemption is attained by presenting these Bank of England notes for payment. The $150,000,000 gold reserve and certain other Treasury assets set apart as a redemption fund by this measure, and by its provisions separated from other Treasury assets, finds its counterpart in the issue department of the Bank of England, which is in effect a department of the British Government as well as a department of a private corporation.

The difference between the English system and the one here proposed is that there the burden of the ultimate redemption of the corporations' promises to pay is thrown upon the bank, while this bill imposes that duty upon the Government.

At this time I will not undertake to trace the analogy further. It runs all through the scheme except in this, that unfortunately the very best feature of the English scheme of finance is not included. Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and English cities outside of London have local banks of issue, some of which have been in existence for more than a century. The notes of these banks circulate almost exclusively in the neighborhoods where they are issued, forming a strictly local medium of exchange and measurably relieving the interior of the destruction of values and business occasioned by panics which have their origin in the puts and calls of the gamblers of the London Stock Exchange.

The American people know by experience that national bank issues have not in the past and will not in the future serve this purpose.

I believe that the Government should issue the paper currency of the country. The Constitution vests in this Congress the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and power to issue paper currency is no less an attribute of sovereignty than the power to coin money.

But the Republican majority in this House is determined to retire the Government's paper issues and are about to enact a law giving to private corporations this supreme prerogative. They seem to have attempted to adopt in its entirety a scheme of finance in vogue in a foreign country, and, lacking time to fully discuss this aspect of the question under consideration, I can only call attention to the fact that conditions here render it impossible for this country to avail itself of the best features of the English system.

And now, Mr. Chairman, a few words as to the levity with which the gentlemen on the other side, nearly every one of whom has confessed that he is a recent convert to Clevelandism, have insisted that the passage of this bill will forever dispose of the question which separated the political parties in 1896. Let me warn the gentlemen who indulge in this illusion that never were they more mistaken.

The question yet to be determined is whether the American people sanction a policy conceived by the small number who are benefited by the gold standard, and which has visited upon mankind more misery than "all the wars and pestilences of recorded times."

You are about to pass a bill intended to perpetuate a system devised for the avowed purpose of cheapening property and increasing the value of money, and think it will be acquiesced in. It never will be.

At its inception the movement in favor of monometallism was based upon the preposterous notion that governments were under obligations to protect the value of money and fixed incomes by barring out of the mints the products of the gold mines of California and Australia. This was to make "money the master—everything else the servant." The question at issue has not changed. The passage of this bill will not change it. Increased production of the gold mines will not eliminate it.

Gentlemen say that bimetalism is a dead issue; that henceforth gold alone is to be the money of final payment; that even though the wisdom of entirely demonetizing silver might have been doubtful at an earlier stage of the discussion, the recent large increase in the production of the gold mines has solved the problem, and therefore there will be general acquiescence in the action about to be taken by the McKinley Administration.

Mr. Chairman, before entering upon a discussion of this, the crucial question, I desire to state in precise terms the basis of the demand for the demonetization of one of the precious metals; when and where it originated, and the motive underlying it. I believe that with a full understanding of indisputable historical facts there would be no division of opinion among the masses in this country concerning the matter. A great many Republican orators and writers have contended that the people the world over grew tired of silver; that they longed to get rid of it, and that to gratify this desire it was demonetized by legislation. In other words, they ascribe the adoption of monometallism to evolution, the survival of the fittest metal, and insist that silver was discarded because the advanced civilization had reached conditions where it was no longer suitable for monetary purposes.

This argument, if argument it can be called, has been made plausible by the fact that in past ages iron, leather, shells, and other gross substances were used as money, and each in its turn abandoned on account of its unsuitableness to serve the purposes of more advanced civilization.

In order to demolish this subterfuge and makeshift it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that in the early fifties, when first the agitation in favor of monometallism began in Europe, its advocates made war on gold and not on silver. Long before that period Ricardo, the great English economist, had advanced the opinion that silver was more suitable for monetary purposes than gold, and supported his contention with arguments of great weight, probably the most forceful of which was that the susceptibility of silver to subdivision into coins of small value adapted it to the daily transactions of nine-tenths of the population and the fact that by its use loss by abrasion was one-twentieth of that entailed by the circulation of gold.

It would require a volume to even cursorily review the history of this controversy down to this the last act in the consummation of a scheme the sole purpose of which always has been and now is diminishment of the world's supply of metallic money. The demand for the demonetization of gold nearly fifty years ago was incited by the rise in prices resulting from a large increase in the production of the gold mines.

Germany, Austria, Holland, and, I think, Portugal actually demonetized gold, and in Europe the fear that it was about to become worthless as a money metal became so general that astute shopkeepers drew trade to their houses by hanging out banners offering to take gold for goods.

A decline in gold production ensued and the agitation ceased, but not until writers in France, Germany, and England, voicing the sentiment of the affluent classes of that period, had published numerous books and pamphlets urging the demonetization of gold as a measure made necessary by the tendency to rising prices everywhere prevalent.

The agitation in favor of monometallism was renewed in 1867. This time it was the discovery of rich silver mines that alarmed the money lenders, bondholders, and others living on fixed incomes. Extravagant stories had been sent out as to the wonderful productiveness of the Nevada mines. Numerous conferences ensued, and finally at the Paris conference of 1867, at which all the great European powers and the United States were represented, an explicit demand for the adoption of monometallism was promulgated. Like that made by Chevalier, the French economist, and his collaborators in Germany and England fifteen years earlier, this demand rested upon a single proposition: It was said that inasmuch as bondholders, money lenders, and others enjoying fixed incomes would be put to greater expense by an increase in the price of living, therefore the upward tendency of prices must be arrested.

At this point I invite especial attention to a fact which it seems to me effectually disposes of the contention that its unsuitableness for monetary purposes occasioned the demonetization of silver. In the published proceedings of the Paris conference will be found the report of a committee setting forth the grounds upon which the demand for the adoption of monometallism was made. Language could not be plainer than was there employed:

It is easy to see that the real value of the metals has diminished. It is difficult to estimate exactly what the diminution is; but, whatever it may be, it demands the attention of governments, because it affects unfavorably all that portion of the population whose income, remaining nominally the same, undergoes a yearly diminution of purchasing power. As governments control the weight and standard of money, they ought, so far as possible, to assure its value; and as it is admitted that the tendency of the metals is to depreciate, this tendency should be arrested by demonetizing one of them.

Mr. Chairman, it would be impossible to make a plainer statement of the question at issue. To prevent a rise in prices and not to serve the convenience of commerce was the motive which then actuated the advocates of the single standard, and the same object animates them now.

The Paris conference did not demand the demonetization of silver. Whether to continue the war on gold or to turn their guns on silver had not then been determined upon by the monometallists.

Finally the demonetization of silver was demanded.

In 1850, 1851, and 1852, when the gold mines were most productive, they objected to gold for monetary purposes.

Fifteen years later, when silver was likely to become more abundant than gold, they determined to bar it out of the mints.

Their object was to "make money scarce, therefore dear," and in each instance they used the means best calculated to accomplish the end then in view.

Further elucidation of the motives and objects of the gold trust is found in the public utterances of leading statesmen and politicians in foreign countries.

In a speech delivered at the international monetary conference of 1881, Mr. Broch, delegate from Norway, protested against the restoration of bimetalism, contending that inasmuch as it would cause higher prices, classes living on fixed incomes would be injured.

A few years before his death, in a speech in the British Parliament, Mr. Gladstone stated the question at issue and gave England's reason for adhering to the gold standard with a frankness that was fairly brutal. He reminded Englishmen that they had ten or more, probably fifteen, billion dollars invested in foreign countries; that payment was not expected; that, on the contrary, the aggregate foreign holdings of England grew larger year after year; that the interest on this vast sum was not paid in money, but commodities—food for the English people and raw materials for their factories; and concluded by saying that under the gold standard they were receiving, as interest on their investments, double the amount of commodities that they would receive under the bimetallic standard. He did not split hairs about ratios nor express alarm about the maintenance of the parity. He urged Englishmen not to disturb conditions which had doubled the value of fixed incomes, and warned them that if they did, prices of the products of American farms would return to the high level of twenty-five years ago, thereby giving Englishmen only one-half the income they then derived from foreign investments.

Mr. Chairman, I have regarded it as necessary to thus review the history of the controversy because, having arrived at the motives and purposes of the great interests back of the gold movement, we can more accurately weigh the value of arguments made on their behalf. Bimetallists rest their case upon a single proposition; that is, that there is not in the world and never will be a sufficient stock of gold to warrant the disuse of silver as money of final redemption. We contend that the mere fact that with both silver and gold in use as full legal-tender money, the supply would be insufficient, and cite in proof of this assertion that it has been in the past, is now, and will continue to be necessary to supplement the stock of specie with paper issues.

Until lately the Republican leaders have at least pretended to concur in this opinion. Prior to the election of Mr. McKinley to the Presidency all the great leaders of his party had given assent to the doctrine which has recently been scoffed at by the friends of this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the sneers of the disciples of Grover Cleveland—and I include in this list even Democrats who favor this measure—I desire to say, first, that history mentions no instance in which a plethora of specie has injured a nation, but history does mention a score of great empires that have passed away for the want of it. Nowhere in the annals of the race is it said that at a particular period a deluge of the precious metals worked injury to its advancement, but great writers concur in saying that decreased productiveness of the mines brought on the dark ages. Sir, history abounds in reference to periods during which civilization languished because of a dearth of gold and silver.

Such was the condition of the world when this continent was discovered, and when Spanish treasure ships, laden with gold and silver from the mines of Peru and Mexico, poured into the channels of trade in Europe a fresh supply of specie, without which there would have been a return of the dark ages, an era of progress and advancement began. Such was the condition of the world fifty years ago when, on account of diminished production of gold and silver in Mexico and South America, the stock of metallic money became so far depleted that throughout the world commerce was carried on largely by barter. Again new life was imparted to civilization by rich discoveries in California and Australia, and again the world resumed its onward and upward march. On this continent most notably, but in a large degree in the remotest corners of the planet, the quickening impulse was felt.

In a single decade the registered tonnage of the world's shipping, intercontinental trade, and the production of the leading staples of commerce almost doubled. In 1820 the tonnage of the world's ships aggregated 5,834,000 tons. Twenty years later it had grown to 3,596,000 tons. In the twenty years following, stimulated by the large additions to the world's stock of specie, it almost doubled, reaching the enormous aggregate of 16,000,000 tons. In 1830 the world's commerce, including imports and exports, amounted to $1,960,000,000; in 1840, to $2,750,000,000; in 1850, to $3,800,000,000. Now mark the influence of an increased circulation. By 1860 it had increased to $7,200,000,000.

Using the progress of our own country as an illustration, in 1830 our commerce, including imports and exports, amounted to $105,000,000; in 1840, to $197,000,000; in 1850, to $297,000,000, and in 1860, to $653,000,000.

I lay down as a fundamental truth that an increase in the world's business necessitates a proportionate increase in the world's stock of metallic money.

Mr. Chairman, I regret my inability to present fully statistics as to this phase of the subject prepared for submission to the House, but will take the liberty of printing in my remarks a table showing the growth of the world's commerce and business during this century:

The prodigious increase in the world's commerce during this century has far outrun the increase in the product of the mines.

It seems to have been reserved for this century to apply all that man had learned before to peaceful pursuits and to experience a realization of every hope indulged by the centuries of the past. In all European countries there has been an enormous increase in the volume of exchanges, domestic and foreign.

During this century there has been a large increase in the area of civilized states; cities have sprung up surrounded by densely populated communities, in regions which, fifty years ago, had not been explored.

It requires a larger sum of money to operate the world's railroads now than it did to pay all the expenses of all the Governments in the world one hundred years ago.

The daily expenses of the newspapers and printing houses in Christendom now exceed the pay roll of the factories of the world a hundred years ago.

The great State of New York contains a larger population than inhabited this continent a hundred years ago.

The foreign commerce, including imports and exports, of the United States this year has exceeded the foreign commerce of all the nations combined a hundred years ago.

The inspiration of modern industrial development has spread to the Orient, and the "sleeping millions" referred to by the great Napoleon as factors in the world's affairs that "were dormant, but not dead," have awakened from the slumber of ages. Industrial and commercial development is going on by leaps and bounds, not in the United States alone, but in every corner of the world, and before I conclude my remarks I think I will be able to demonstrate that, no matter what the output of the mines, it is not and never will be sufficient, even partially, to meet the demand for metallic money.

Why, Mr. Chairman, stronger arguments for the doctrines contended for by bimetalists have never been made than have fallen from the lips of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who have spoken in favor of this bill.

They have said over and over again that the revival in business which has recently taken place was attributable to an increased stock of the precious metals.

They have attributed rising prices to an increase in the per capita circulation.

They have pointed to the enormous quantity of gold brought to this country by the favorable balance of trade; to increased issues of paper currency and the coinage of several millions of silver as blessings of incomputable value.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] presented and has printed in the RECORD elaborate tables and voluminous statistics, all going to show a considerable increase in the volume of money, and he and other Republican orators who followed him agree that renewed business activity, rising prices, increased production, and vast additions to the wealth of the country have resulted.

Could recognition of the quantitative theory of money be more complete?

And yet in 1896 you said we had plenty of money and denied that more would restore prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in trying to make a very strong case in favor of a bill that fastens gold monometallism upon the country the gentlemen have taken a position absolutely fatal to the theory on which the measure rests. They have laid much stress upon the large increase in our export trade, and with the native modesty of orthodox Republican statesmanship have taken unto themselves and their party full credit therefor. What, may I ask, have the politicians had to do with bringing about the more favorable business conditions now prevailing? Did Republican stump speeches cause for three consecutive years, beginning with 1896, crop failures in India, Russia, the Balkan States, and Austria-Hungary, our rivals in the production of wheat, thereby giving us a monopoly of European markets at prices made higher by abnormal scarcity? This, not Republican speeches, is what gave us a large favorable balance of trade and brought about accidental replenishment of our stock of metallic money, without which prosperity would have been impossible.

By pointing to large imports of gold and consequent better times the Republicans admit that what we needed in 1896 was not "confidence," but more money. It came to us, not as a result of anything done by the politicians or national bankers, but in payment for the products of the farms of the Mississippi Valley. Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska—three States that cast their electoral votes for Bryan and bimetalism—had more to do with restoring prosperity than all New England, with New York thrown in for good count.

Before entering upon an examination of the elaborate tables and voluminous statistics cited by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] I desire to call attention to some well-known economic facts. The first and most important is that according to the very best authorities fully three-fourths of the gold produced by the mines is absorbed by the arts or carried to oriental countries, from whence it never returns. Now, I know there is a disposition to brush this statement aside as incredible, but facts coming constantly under our own observation, as well as the history of the race, prove its correctness.

Gentlemen may say that this might have been true when the mines were producing a much smaller quantity than now, but that South Africa, the Klondike, and Cripple Creek are so deluging the world with gold that now no such a thing is possible.

I think it is only necessary to casually examine this assumption to prove its incorrectness. Other factors besides the extent of the production of the mines enter into the problem. It is in periods of depression that the largest additions are made to the volume of metallic money. In hard times economy is practiced by a large proportion of the population. Protracted periods of commercial paralysis compel a great many to forego the luxuries. The first pinch of hard times cuts down expenditures for things that can be dispensed with, and as long as hard times continue economy is practiced. During such a period the encroachment of the arts upon the stock of precious metals is at the minimum. Under such circumstances out of a relatively small output of the mines the money supply would be considerably increased.

The converse of this proposition is true. General prosperity enables a large proportion of the population to gratify the whims of fashion or cravings inspired by love of the beautiful and unattainable. It results that at the zenith of a prosperous era the consumption of gold is at the maximum, and with large production the increase in metallic money is small.

And I think, Mr. Chairman, that right here is found an explanation of what otherwise would be a mystery. We are told that gold and silver are durable metals, and that since their preciousness is a motive for their preservation from destruction the aggregate stock is being constantly increased.

Where, then, are the vast treasures that have been wrung from the mines by the toil and sacrifice of all the generations that have preceded us? To my mind the answer to this question seems very simple. As you walk down Pennsylvania avenue keep your eye on the shopkeepers' windows and then bear in mind that the display of jewelry and works of art wrought in gold and silver there seen are duplicated in every city in Christendom. In the palaces of the rich and in the hovels of the poor you may find an answer to this question, which, I think, effectually disposes of the arguments made in support of this measure.

The statistics presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] clearly prove that, notwithstanding the large increase in the production of the gold mines mentioned by him so boastfully, the addition to the world's stock of coined money has not relieved the strain felt by the financial world in recent years nor ameliorated the intensity of the struggle which constantly for years has menaced the prosperity of nations and the fortunes of individuals.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] presents a table showing the production of gold from 1862 to 1898, inclusive.

According to this table the world produced during this period gold of the value of $5,082,935,800.

Mulhall gives the aggregate stock of gold money in the world in 1898 at $1,594,900,000. Adding, $150,000,000 as a liberal estimate of the sum of subsequent additions to that amount, we have $4,744,900,000 as the aggregate stock of gold money now in the world.

Do these figures not plainly prove that there is now in use in the world as money a great deal less than the product of this century? Do they not in fact prove that the world's stock of gold money is at this time barely equal to the product of the mines during the past thirty-five years? They certainly do prove that gentlemen who have persuaded themselves that gold production has grown so large as to effectually settle the money question have reached that conclusion without investigation or reflection, and that some of the orators of the other side who have sneered at bimetallicism as a dead issue may be pardoned on account of their want of information on this subject.

But, Mr. Chairman, in other respects the statistics presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] are absolutely conclusive on this point.

According to the table showing the production of gold in recent years, the mines produced during the past ten years in round numbers $1,785,000,000 in gold. Statisticians say that this year's product will amount to over $300,000,000. Let us place it at that sum. This added to the product of the past ten years, as shown by the table brought here by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], makes the aggregate product since 1888 $2,085,000,000.

This is a very large amount of gold, and if we accept the tables as accurate, and I know they are drawn from the most reliable sources within our reach, it is equal to two-thirds of all the gold money in the world in 1873.

But I assert, and shall undertake to demonstrate, that studied in the light of current history these figures, instead of proving that it is safe to rely upon the gold supply for a supply of metallic money, prove precisely the contrary. I have called attention to the product of the mines during the past ten years for the purpose of inquiring of gentlemen on the other side of the House what has become of it? It is true that recently our imports of gold have largely exceeded our exports; but it is also true that during the ten-year period referred to we sent abroad nearly a hundred million more gold than we imported.

Why is it, then, that when the United States reclaimed less than two hundred and eighty million of the three hundred and sixty-four million sent abroad during the past ten years all European capitals experienced the shock?

When the gold went abroad we were engulfed in ruin.

The gold recently imported into this country came to us in the ordinary course of trade, and when it came to us a wail was heard in every countingroom in London, Berlin, Paris, and St. Petersburg. To prevent gold exports the Imperial Bank of Germany advanced interest rates to 7 per cent. So did the Bank of England, and France took similar measures to prevent gold leaving that country. For three months or more the European papers have been discussing with alarm the prospects of further losses of gold.

What, then, becomes of the pretense that enormous production has settled the question?

If increased production has not relieved the situation, what may we expect when production declines?

When the South African war broke out, the London papers, reflecting the views of English bankers, indulged in gloomy forebodings as to the effect the loss of the product of the Transvaal mines would have upon the money market, and this notwithstanding the fact that over $2,000,000,000 has been produced by the mines since 1898. Again I inquire, Where has it gone? What has become of it?

While nominally all European countries have adopted the gold standard, Russia, Austria, Italy, and Spain use depreciated paper. Gold measures their debts, but the money of commerce used by their people is paper. Austria has been on a paper basis ever since the Napoleonic wars, with no prospect of returning to the use of specie as long as the gold standard holds sway. This observation applies also to Italy and Spain, where paper has been the money of commerce for a considerable period and is likely to remain so indefinitely. Russia has the largest gold reserve in the world, but ever since the Crimean war depreciated paper has been the sole circulating medium in that country. A year ago the great Empire began the redemption and retirement of paper, with a view to the resumption of specie payment, and thereby became subject to the evils which for a generation have afflicted every nation in which the gold standard prevails.

I thus refer to the status of monetary affairs in European countries for the purpose of directing attention to the fact that whatever advantages have grown out of the enormous production of gold, so frequently referred to in this discussion, have accrued to the five leading gold-standard countries—the United States, France, Germany, Great Britain, and Russia. Has the gold produced by the mines in recent years gone into the monetary circulation of these countries? Go read their newspapers for an answer. Read the foreign telegrams that appear day after day in the American newspapers, and learn that all Europe is threatened with a gold famine.

When recently the Secretary of the Treasury bought twenty millions of the Government bonds in order to relieve the New York money market the London papers expressed thankfulness for the timely intervention and congratulated the capitalists upon the fact that this would relieve the stringency in New York and prevent our drawing large balances which stand to our credit in London banking houses, and added that this would at least temporarily relieve the pressure in London, but that at Berlin pronounced stringency existed, and that no means for the relief of Germany were in sight.

Since then it has transpired that the action of our Treasury Department has enabled New York to go to London's relief. Large shipments of gold are going from New York to the English capital, and our bankers are adding to their large English balances. Notwithstanding the stringency at home and the fact that they could to-morrow draw on London for many millions, they are exporting gold by the million to prop up the gold standard there.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber look upon this great question from the standpoint from which Europe viewed it six or seven years ago. Then the balance of trade was against us, and in payment we were compelled to send large quantities of gold to Europe. The result was great stringency. Recently the balance of trade has been against Europe and part of our gold has come back to us and Europe is threatened with a financial collapse.

I direct attention to current events for the purpose of again inquiring what has become of the deluge of gold that has poured out of the mines during the last ten or twelve years. I declare that it has not placed even the strongest money powers in the world on a strong financial basis.

We contended in 1896 that there was not enough gold in the world to furnish the great commercial powers with a sufficient stock of specie. Everything that has transpired since then has proven the correctness of that position.

In conclusion, I desire to state broadly what I conceive to be the real problem involved. When first the bondholders and kindred classes demanded the demonetization of one or the other of the precious metals in order to make money scarce, the fixed debts of the world represented a comparatively small sum. I have seen in print the statement that at the end of the Napoleonic wars the world's fixed debts and dividend-bearing stocks in quasi-public corporations combined did not exceed twenty billions. It is probable that by 1850 the amount had doubled, and recent estimates place it at from one hundred and fifty to two hundred billions. Including State, municipal, corporate, and individual debts secured by mortgages, doubtless the aggregate is at least one hundred and fifty billions.

Placing the earning power of this enormous sum at 4 per cent per annum, it exacts in dividends and interest every year the enormous sum of $6,000,000,000. Under existing conditions a large portion of the six billions—at least two-thirds of it, and probably more—is added to the principal, and so the world sinks deeper and deeper into the bondage of debt. Every year the total sum of fixed charges becomes greater.

The enactment of this bill is another step in the direction of compelling the world to go on compounding the interest on fixed debts, thereby fastening perpetually upon the world the grasp of the money power.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen, usury is devouring the world. Everywhere the usurer is omnipotent. I firmly believe there is not in the world a single government that is not absolutely controlled by financial syndicates, corporations, and millionaire bankers. In this free Republic they have seized control of first one political party and then another in order to work out their evil purposes. They elect our Presidents, in many cases name the judges of our courts, and in every State in the Union employ the professional lobbyist to superintend politics, manipulate conventions, and control public policies. They seduce the weak, buy the vicious, and, by means of political machinery that only money will buy, strike down and destroy whoever is bold enough to dispute their sway.

Centralized wealth is a menace to human liberty in every part of the globe. In these latter days it has achieved many victories beneficial to the few and oppressive to the many. It has made kings, presidents, legislatures, and courts the instrumentalities by which it is rapidly absorbing the wealth of Christendom. Grievous have been the sins of truculent rulers and public officials who have yielded to its blandishments, but of all the infamies ever perpetrated for its benefit the step about to be taken by this Congress is the most infamous.

Sir, the impartial future historian will not fail to brand with dishonor the political party that is about to commit this crime. By the passage of this bill the scheme devised by the bondholders and capitalists of Europe fifty years ago receives the approval of the Republican party. It never has received the approval of the American people, and it never will.

To-day you gloat over this victory achieved by the flagrant violation of the confidence of the people, but a day of reckoning will come. "Be sure thy sin shall find thee out."

Throughout this discussion gentlemen have mentioned boastfully the general revival of business and industry throughout the country, the inference being that the country is indebted to Republican stump speakers for better times.

My friends, prosperity is not the creation of politicians. The men who toil, and not the men who talk, perform the labor and produce the wealth that blesses mankind. To the miner who plies his weary task unblest by the sunlight, to the sailor who braves the dangers of the deep, to the pioneer who fells the forest, to the husbandman plowing in the field, to the artisan to whose skilled hands we are indebted for every comfort that blesses our homes, to God's creatures of the humbler sort the country is indebted for renewed prosperity.

If the eloquent gentlemen who have so immoderately praised themselves and their party as the authors of prosperity will look about them, without difficulty they may learn the cause of better times. The source of prosperity is told by the myriad voices of busy industry; the thunder of the locomotive, the whir of factory wheels, the song of the husbandman as he plows his field tell us whence it comes. To those who toil and are content, if so be it that poor privilege be given them, be awarded all the glory which Republican orators would take unto themselves. Blessed be they, the fruition of whose devotion is read in the sheen of golden harvests and seen in the product of field, forest, factory, mine, and shop. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will ask leave to print without the five days' limit, on account of some statistics which I can not prepare within that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD without regard to the five days' limit. Is there objection?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think that will have to be taken up in the House and not in the committee.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not see that it would have to be.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The committee has no power to grant that request. That will have to be made in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] is correct.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, since there has been so much of confession and not much of avoidance on the part of our friends on the other side, I suppose they will allow us some liberty of discussion. They promised us—or at least one of them did, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]—to listen to our speeches and heed them not. Therefore, I suppose they will not think us unduly critical in any remarks we may make. Some of them are complaining of the fact that some on this side have charged them with being insincere. If I mistake not (and I do not think I do) the Republican party in national convention assembled, in their national platform, denounced the Democratic Administration a few years ago for its efforts to demonetize silver.

Mr. CARMACK. And, Mr. McKinley did the same thing.

Mr. SIMS. And, as suggested by my colleague, Mr. McKinley, who is now President, did the same.

Now, why did you denounce the Democratic Administration for its efforts to demonetize silver if it was a thing that ought to be done. My friends, do you regard this simply as a temporary matter? Is there no principle in it? Does it only have a momentary application? Was that platform made for that campaign only? Did you mean what you said? If you did, the demonetization of silver was worthy of your severest condemnation at that time. You put your fighting clothes and armor on and went forth to slay those who would demonetize silver. How long has that been? Where is the army that you sent forth to do battle for the cause of silver? One gentleman on the other side said, yesterday if I mistake not, that he did not care to be confronted with any statement that he had made heretofore; and I do not blame him. [Laughter.]

Why, he said prosperity had come upon them in such a wave out in Iowa that he was unable to get labor with which to build a barn since he had become a farmer. But in two minutes he let out the fact that he was in debt to everybody about there, and do you expect to get men to work for such a man as that? [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Why, my friend, you ought to have bluffed your other creditors as you said you did the insurance company before you tried to build a barn. [Renewed laughter.] My friend, Mr. DOLLIVER, of Iowa, said there came a small but potent voice from some place somewhere out in the State of Ohio—and I believe all places exist there for political purposes [laughter]—that we should "open the doors of the manufactories instead of the mints"—and that met with hearty approval upon the other side of the House—and as soon as you got in power you passed a bill, the Dingley tariff bill, and the doors of the manufactories forthwith all flew open.

But what else happened? As a logical result of the provision of that bill you built up and added another industry. Trusts opened their doors and the whole Republican party went in thereat. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Then what followed? When the trusts and combinations were formed sufficiently they began to close, and actually did close, the very doors that the Dingley bill was passed to open. [Applause.] Well, I suppose this is just simply Republican progress. Why, yes; we have got prosperity. They say on the other side, and I will not deny it, that labor is at present generally employed at living wages; but I believe it to be a fact, and so assert it, that from the panic level wages, on the average, have not increased over 10 per cent, and from the panic level manufactured goods have advanced many of them 100 per cent, and possibly more than that.

Therefore the operation of Republican legislation is not equal, is not fair, is not just, and through the doors of the trusts, and those who go in thereat, the manufacturers have reaped a 100 per cent profit, and in some cases 200 per cent. You said, Give us the Dingley bill, by which we will have the exclusive American market for our manufacturers, and there will be such an increase of competition at home that it will bring down the price of manufactured articles. You said that with the help of the exclusive American market you could compete with the world in manufactures. After you got the tariff and all you asked, and after you have the trusts and combinations without number, why, then, what else do you ask?

Why, now you have got to be great advocates of commerce and trade expansion; and in order to enable you to sell the goods made in this country with labor receiving American wages you actually ask Congress to walk up and pass the Payne ship-subsidy bill—to pay the freight in order that you may sell those goods in free-trade countries in competition with the pauper labor of those localities. Well, I suppose you will pass that bill. I suppose the great ship lines will get that. I suppose the manufacturers will get it, because they have never knocked at Republican doors in vain. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Now, my friends, I want to ask this question in all candor: If you are going to go to the gold standard, why not go to it in a logical way? If there is anything else in this measure except the assertion of the fact that we are on the gold standard and have been since 1834, why not do it in a logical way? Do you suppose the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is exactly in accord with the provisions of this bill? Do you suppose that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] is in accord with it? Of course we know they will support it, but if you want to get the gold standard go straight and logically about it. Redeem, cancel, and destroy every greenback by paying gold for them; withdraw every Treasury note and pay for it in gold; purchase every silver dollar and pay for them in gold. Where would you get the gold with which to do this, do you ask? Get it just as you do in this bill, by selling bonds and buying it. There is no other way to get it.

Then we would have one big bond issue and it would be over. My friends, you are afraid to trust the sincerity of your purpose, your real object, to your constituents, and you want to bring them to it by degrees. What is the result? You propose—and there are indications that you will gain your object—a bill that puts it within the power of those having sufficient means to regulate the markets and manipulate them to make thousands of dollars, yea millions of dollars, by the manipulation of the Treasury under this bill.

Now, my friends, why keep the greenbacks in existence in mere name? Why keep the silver dollars in existence in mere name? If, through the operations of this bill, you have got to maintain parity between silver and gold by means of the heavy hand of taxation, why keep the silver dollars at all? There are but two logical courses open, and one is the free coinage of silver into standard dollars with no string to it, and the other is a simple gold standard with the absolute obliteration of everything else in the way of money but the bank note. You know that this is logical—and this is what you intend to do—and what it will come to, providing you succeed.

Now, my friends—and I appeal to you as such because you all love me—why do you want to put it within the power of the greed of man to use the taxing power of this Government for his own individual benefit? I say that the present bill holds out the greatest inducements that have ever been offered to the greed of the monopolists to make money for themselves out of the provisions of the bill. Under this bill capitalists, individuals, and corporations can go to the Treasury and present greenbacks in quantity sufficient to take every dollar out of the Treasury that is now there in gold.

By the operation of this law these greenbacks are locked up in the division of issue and redemption. These gentlemen, having that motive in view, can take the $240,000,000 in gold now in the Treasury out by presenting greenbacks for it under this bill and lock it up in the banks, while the paper money paid for it is locked up in the Treasury by this bill, and at once you have a contraction in the money in circulation to the extent of $480,000,000. You may say that they will not do it. But why leave the door open for such a raid on the Treasury? Why make it possible? Instead of the endless chain, you are going by this bill to create an endless source of bond issue. I will not be so cruel as to charge that it is the one thing you have in view, but, however, you ought to be charged with that which necessarily follows the provisions of your measure.

Now, what else? You have enabled those who so desire to contract the currency by this simple operation to the extent of $480,000,000. There are over $200,000,000 Treasury notes and greenbacks remaining in circulation after taking every dollar in gold in the Treasury out by their presentation that can the next day be presented and gold be demanded for them. The Treasury is without option; it must sell bonds for gold for the second installment. Banks, corporations, and individuals can thus operate; they can thus reduce the volume of outstanding circulation and bring corresponding depression in stocks and commodities which they can buy in at low prices, after which all they have to do is to return the gold from the vaults where they locked it up to the Treasury, get back the greenbacks and Treasury notes and put them into the banks, and they go into circulation. The gold, when paid back to the Treasury, goes back into circulation; therefore the currency is increased and prices advance, and that which they bought at low prices they will unload at great profits.

Now, it is within the opportunity of a political party to place within the temptations of the avarice and greed of men to do such a thing as this through the operations of this bill, and the markets can be put up or down just as often as desired, and bond issues can be forced without limit. Now, I appeal to you as honest men, why do you not come out in a heroic way, why do you not retire the greenbacks absolutely? Simply because you are afraid that your constituents have not progressed as far as you have, and you are waiting for your constituents to reach your present stage of progression.

Now, my friends, it has been alluded to here before on this floor that we have great prosperity; that it is due to the gold standard. There is prosperity all over the world at the present time. If it is due to the gold standard, they had it many years ago, and we have had it since 1834, as claimed by the other side. If to the mere fact of the existence of certain conditions we are to attribute all that follows, every panic in the United States since 1834 can be charged to the gold standard.

But, Mr. Chairman, as shown by the gentleman from Indiana on yesterday in the discussion of this question, the output of gold throughout the world has increased and reached the enormous sum of $287,000,000 last year. Now, would not this gold, if coined and turned into standard money, as it has been, have the logical and legitimate effect that we have always insisted that it would have and that we have in the course of the discussions on the floor of the House on these measures always claimed that it would have—that is, to increase prices? We have contended that with the increase in the standard money of the country the prices of commodities would increase, while with a decrease of the volume of money in circulation prices would decrease. Is anyone able now to say that this increased production of gold is likely to continue?

Is it not a fact that all gentlemen may recognize that the increased production of the gold mines of the world to-day is due more to accident than to effort, and is it not also true that when a mine is exhausted its output is forever gone? Have you any means of assuring the country that it will continue? You know that the enormous output of gold in the last few years has been due very largely to new processes for the extraction of gold from the low-grade ores which have heretofore been rejected. Well, a time will come when these low-grade ores will be exhausted. Improved methods have enabled us to use some of these ores; but there is a limit to them. If we could know, as a matter of fact, and determine in advance the output and increase of the gold mines of the world, so as to establish beyond question that the money supply from that source would be sufficient to meet the requirements of the world, then the question would be greatly simplified. But the exhaustion of the gold mines and the increased difficulty of procuring gold are matters that we are compelled to consider in connection with a proposition of this kind.

I know the argument has been made heretofore, and is being made to-day, that it is not honest for a great people like the people of the United States to pay their debts with money which is worth commercially 50 cents on the dollar. But if you were honest in your declaration of three years ago, and if you wanted bimetalism by international agreement or otherwise then or now, I ask you is this bill conducive to such an end? My good and frank friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] says he does not want it. I thank him for his candor. If there is a gentleman on that side of the House in favor of bimetalism by international agreement or otherwise I should be thankful if he would let me know it. I pause for an answer. I get none; and so I conclude that there are no gentlemen on the other side in favor of any such agreement as that. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Therefore, I charge that if England, France, Germany, and all the rest of the commercial world proposed to us the free coinage of silver, all gentlemen on the other side of the House would stand ready to vote against it, and it would be defeated by the unanimous voice of that party. If there is a single gentleman on the other side who is in favor of bimetalism of any kind or character, please let us know it. You are all silent as the grave.

Now, I know, Mr. Chairman, that you are not hypocritical. You have not been hypocritical in the past and are not now. You have declared your opinions openly and boldly. You have progressed, it is true; but let us look a little further into the result of the legislation you are now advocating. This law will provide for an indefinite issue of bonds, and by means of the same legislation we shall create a nontaxed class of people who live on the interest of the bonds of the Government and pay no taxes for any purpose whatever.

Why is it necessary, my friends, so far as existing contracts or indebtedness are concerned, to change the unit of payment from the denominations which were written in the contracts at the time they were made? Why give more than the "pound of flesh" when it is not demanded? Why not let the law apply to contracts hereafter to be entered into? Why undertake an indebtedness involving millions upon millions of dollars for the sole benefit of the creditor classes? Would it not be sufficient for all national purposes and for sustaining and maintaining the credit of the Government to go to the gold standard from now on? Why apply it to obligations which are entirely satisfactory to their holders as they now exist? Why apply it to old contracts?

It has been referred to during the course of this discussion, and I desire briefly to refer to it myself to show how this question was applied and dealt with during the Administration of President Cleveland. I wish to show how it was proposed to take 3 per cent interest on the part of the bondholder if the word "gold" was written in the bond instead of coin, and making a difference of $16,000,000 saving to the Government on about sixty-two and one-half million dollars of bonds then proposed to be issued. The conclusion is plain; you can not escape it; and if you pass this bill and send it to the Senate, and that body passes it, there can be only one result that will follow from its enactment. There will be an advance in prices of bonds and stocks, but in nothing else.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, would it interrupt the gentleman to tell us whether Tennessee is now prosperous under the gold standard?

Mr. SIMS. It will not interrupt me in the least. I am glad to tell the gentleman and everybody else just how Tennessee is getting along under Democratic rule. [Laughter.] Tennessee is prosperous in a measure, and prosperous in spots, as was suggested by another gentleman. All who have coal, and iron, and marble to sell, and timber, all of which have received their share of "the fatted calf" in the shape of the McKinley bill, have considerable money to circulate and feel that the times are better.

But where cotton has been grown and other agricultural products—corn, wheat, and things of that sort—the people are better off than they were in 1893 and a few years afterwards, but the change is so slight that you can not make the people themselves believe it. Further, the sale of live stock, mules, horses, and cattle have been enhanced, as you are bound to admit, by the war with Spain, the present war in the Philippines, and the war in the Transvaal. Men are in my State right now buying mules for the English army. Do you claim, my good friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], that the existing gold standard has brought about all these benefits? [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. Did any of those things exist in 1894 and 1895 and 1896?

Mr. SIMS. No; there was no war in those years, and prosperity among the farmers of Tennessee is like this bill—a new measure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. May it not be that it is the adherence to the gold standard that has produced the war in South Africa, and hence become a part of the gold standard scheme?

Mr. SIMS. Why, my friend, as the war in Africa is of English production, of course it is the result of the gold standard and those who believe in it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, at the expense of being charged with repetition I will analyze this bill. The objects of this bill are many.

First, to declare that the standard unit of value shall be the dollar and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle. It must follow, if this bill becomes a law, that nothing is standard money but gold. A dollar can no longer be coined from silver, neither is any silver coin longer a dollar. It no longer depends, even in part, on the intrinsic or commercial value of the metal contained in it to give it value as currency or money. It in fact and effect becomes nothing more than a debt or liability of the Government. It is utterly demonetized and effectually destroyed as even a factor to be considered in prices of commodities or the burdens or benefits of contracts. It becomes in fact and in effect nothing more than mere token money and takes its place alongside nickels and pennies. And this is true not only as to silver dollars heretofore coined, but as to any that may hereafter be coined.

Only two years ago the Republicans claimed to be the only real friends of the double standard; they insisted with much seriousness that they were really and honestly in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, but on account of existing conditions in the great commercial nations of the world they were fearful of being able to maintain free coinage and that we would go to a single silver standard if we attempted it alone, and this they did not want any more than they wanted a single gold standard; that they believed with the efforts of this Government that they could get a sufficient number of the commercial nations of Europe to join in an agreement with this Government to effectually maintain the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1; that they would seek to promote and bring about such an agreement.

A majority of the people believed these promises were made in good faith and voted the Republican ticket. A commission was appointed, sent to England, France, and other countries. And while this commission was in Europe and working, apparently to secure the ends proposed, the Secretary of the Treasury was giving out statements at home here that indicated plainly to England that we did not want to succeed in our efforts, so called, to secure the promised international agreement; that we were really insincere. How could we hope to succeed in an effort to secure international bimetallicism while virtually saying that we did not want it?

After the passage of this act making all debts now existing or hereafter created, both public and private, payable in gold, will it not be in the nature of impairing the obligation of these contracts to repeal this law or enact a law securing, by the consent of the commercial nations of Europe, the free and unlimited coinage of silver? In other words, if we, by passing this bill, write gold in the face of every existing contract, can not the holders of these obligations demand gold, even if free coinage should eventually come by international agreement or without it? Then if you on the other side are really desirous of securing international bimetallicism, why pass this law, which can only prove a very serious if not an insurmountable obstacle in the way of such a result?

If you were favorable to bimetallicism of any kind, international or otherwise, you would not want this bill to become a law. But this breaking of your pledges to the people you are pleased to style progress. God pity a people who are ruled by a party who believe in or are satisfied with any such progress. If keeping faith with the people is old foggyism, I hope and pray that the Democratic party will continue to be an old foggy.

You say that we are now on the gold standard, but you admit that every dollar of the public debt can be paid in the existing silver dollars; that every dollar of our private indebtedness not otherwise provided in the contract is payable in existing silver dollars.

With 3 per cent Government bonds at an enormous premium in gold, although payable in silver, what calls for this legislation whereby they are made payable in gold only? What do we owe these bondholders that we should by legislation further enhance the value of their bonds? What has the poor, oppressed debtor done that the burden of his existing indebtedness now payable in either gold or silver shall be made heavier by making his debts payable in gold only?

The old, worn-out, and threadbare argument is resorted to that the intrinsic or commercial value of the two metals has grown to be so far apart that it is no longer just and honest to pay debts calling for dollars in 412½ grains of standard silver, issued and coined on Government account, called a dollar. If you are, as you have heretofore professed to be, the friends of silver, why strike this additional blow at the commercial value of silver? Do you expect to increase the commercial value of silver by continuing to legislate against it? Do you expect to reduce the commercial or exchange value of gold by additional legislation in its favor?

I have often heard it said that you can not legislate value into silver or out of it nor can you legislate value into or out of gold; that the value of these two metals is due alone to their intrinsic qualities or properties. I admit that in so far as commercial or exchange value depends upon the intrinsic qualities or properties of either gold or silver you can neither add to or take away by legislation. But commercial value and intrinsic value are not synonymous. Commercial or exchange value does not depend alone upon the intrinsic qualities of gold and silver.

Commercial or exchange value includes all elements of value. Commercial or exchange value is the value possessed by money and can be and often is very greatly affected by legislation. Commercial or exchange value of any article is equal to the sum of all demands for it. Where a demand for an article is either increased or decreased by the effect of legislation its exchange or commercial value is affected accordingly and does not depend alone upon the intrinsic properties of the particular article of merchandise or property so affected.

Now, wheat as a grain has higher intrinsic value than corn; it also has higher commercial or exchange value. These two grains are used as food by the human race. Suppose that, for sanitary reasons, the use of Indian corn as an article of diet for human beings should be prohibited by legislation, what would be the result? The exchange value of corn would fall, while the exchange value of wheat would increase. Why? Because so much of the demand for corn as was caused by its use as human food has ceased; yet corn retains all the elements of intrinsic value it ever had, and its fall in price is due alone to unfriendly legislation; while, on the other hand, the price or commercial value of wheat has been increased, as more wheat or its products must be used in order to take the place of the products of corn, the use of which has been prohibited by legislation. Due to this cause, wheat advances in all the markets of the world, while the intrinsic qualities of wheat have neither been added to nor taken away by legislation. The same would also be true of many other products.

If by law the use of cotton in the manufacture of cloth was prohibited, the price of wool would at once advance, because there would be an additional commercial demand for wool, and this without any change in the intrinsic properties of wool.

Mr. Chairman, as gold and silver are commodities and nothing more, why are they not subject to the same effects due to legislation that any other product is? They certainly are, and no amount of sophistry can prove the contrary.

If we will only make it to the interest of the creditor class of this country to sustain and support the value of silver instead in depressing it, very different results will follow. The gentlemen on the other side propose to put the property evidenced by bonds, stocks, mortgages, and all forms of fixed indebtedness beyond the danger of unfavorable fluctuation, and by means of taxation keep it there. That is, you make all debts, private and public, payable in gold and provide that all other money shall be kept as good as gold by exchanging gold for it, and to get this gold with which to make the exchange you propose to sell bonds when necessary. You thus effectually remove every incentive to maintain the value of silver from that class of people who alone are able to maintain it.

If you wish to bring about certain results in any of the affairs of mankind, you need only to make it to the interest of those having the ability to accomplish the desired results, and they will certainly follow.

Mr. Chairman, suppose you have an obligation from your neighbor calling for the delivery of 10,000 bushels of wheat next October. Will you be found proclaiming to your friends that an enormous acreage of wheat has been planted; that the plant is in unusually good condition; that seasons are favorable for a large yield, and that the foreign demand will be light? I answer, No, sir; your interest is in sustaining the value of wheat and not in depressing it. You will not spend hours and days in trying to convince the world that there is an overproduction of wheat.

The same is true of silver. If we refuse to write "gold" in all the bonds, mortgages, and all other forms of indebtedness or contracts the terms of which are expressed in dollars, we will at least retain the partial support of the creditor class in our efforts to bring about international bimetallicism. If it was probable that all such forms of indebtedness would be discharged in 412½-grain silver dollars, this creditor class will be interested in sustaining the value of the silver dollar.

Give us free, unlimited, independent coinage of silver at 16 to 1 and you will have heard the last of the 50-cent dollar. The creditor class would be the potential owners of every silver dollar coined or to be coined, and would also be interested in maintaining the value of the same, and with the ability they now have, coupled with the interest to do so, the maintaining of the parity of the two coins would no longer require legislation or Treasury operation.

Debtors really have no money. They may be temporarily in possession of money, but it is not theirs—no more than a borrowed horse is owned by the borrower—while on the other hand the creditor class may not in fact be in possession of all the money in the world, but they are nevertheless the real and true owners of the same and have lost possession only temporarily and by way of a loan for compensation called interest. So with free coinage every ounce of silver would be potentially coined and in use as money just as gold is, and the same interests that uphold and protect gold would take care of silver in the same way, prompted and moved by the same causes. But with this bill a law and in operation, silver must further decline, as the creditor class are wholly relieved by it from any possible injury by such further decline, and are the only class who really have the power to prevent it.

So, Mr. Chairman, in both practical and moral effect this bill is in the interest of the creditor class only, and just so far as it is a benefit to them it is a corresponding injury to the unfortunate debtor class.

The Republicans are acting in the spirit of the parable, that from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath, and to him that hath shall be given, that he have more abundantly, and this is to be accounted to them for righteousness.

Taking this bill in order, the next thing proposed after establishing the single gold standard is to break the so-called "endless chain," by which gold is taken from the Treasury by presentation of greenbacks and Treasury notes. This is to be accomplished by establishing what is named in the bill as the division of "issue and redemption" in the Treasury Department, to which is to be transferred from the general fund in the Treasury all the gold coin and bullion held against outstanding gold certificates, all the silver dollars held against outstanding silver certificates, all the silver dollars and bullion held against outstanding Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, all the United States notes held against outstanding currency certificates, and an amount of gold coin and bullion to constitute a reserve fund equal to 25 per cent of the amount both of United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, outstanding.

And in order to maintain this gold reserve fund the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell gold bonds of the United States bearing interest in gold not to exceed 3 per cent per annum. And in order to maintain parity the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to give gold in exchange for any other money issued or coined by the United States, and when so redeemed or exchanged said money is to remain in said department of issue and redemption and shall not be withdrawn or disbursed except in exchange for an equal amount of the coin for which said money is redeemed or exchanged.

Bad as the present law is, this bill is infinitely worse. This bill places the Treasury of the United States completely in the hands of the banks and money dealers. By the operations of this law the money of the country can be locked up and its volume restricted at any time the banks see proper to do so. Under existing law, or other rules of the Treasury Department, when greenbacks are exchanged for gold they can be and are used by the Treasury Department for any and all purposes as same as the gold paid out for them could have been. But under this bill, when a greenback or Treasury note is paid into the Treasury for gold it must remain there until it is again paid out or exchanged for gold. It is thus completely locked up and withdrawn from circulation of every kind and character.

According to the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there are outstanding and in circulation United States notes amounting to $301,976,239; Treasury notes act July 14, 1890, $88,893,894, making the sum of $483,870,133, practically every dollar of which can be offered at any time under the provisions of this bill should it become a law and gold demanded and received for the same. On the 6th day of December, 1899, the net gold in the Treasury, including bullion, was $238,065,588.87. Suppose Treasury notes and United States notes to this amount are presented to the Treasury and gold exchanged for them; not one cent of gold would remain in the Treasury to exchange for other United States notes that might be presented, while there would remain outstanding and in circulation greenbacks and Treasury notes to the amount of $245,804,544.13.

Suppose, then, that there should be a demand to redeem $200,000,000 of these outstanding greenbacks and Treasury notes, how would it be accomplished? The answer is obvious to everyone. Bonds would have to be sold to the amount of $200,000,000 for the purpose of bringing back into the Treasury the gold paid out for the greenbacks and Treasury notes in the first instance. I ask, what is to prevent a repetition of the same thing as often as a bond issue was desirable by those seeking such an investment? We thus have a new endless chain of bond issues by using the provisions of this bill above pointed out.

Besides the use of United States notes and Treasury notes for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury, if necessary to maintain the parity of gold and silver coins, in his discretion is authorized to exchange gold for silver dollars, so that those desiring to manipulate the markets of the country by an alternate tight and easy money market can, under the provisions of this bill, use the existing silver dollars to secure their objects the same as United States notes and Treasury notes.

Mr. Chairman, so far as enabling the speculators to use the United States Treasury to enable them to carry on their operations, they could not otherwise do. This bill is more to their liking and conserves their interests much better than to absolutely redeem and cancel all the United States notes and Treasury notes and to buy in every silver dollar and sell them as bullion in the markets, as before stated. By this course of procedure the United States paper money and silver money would go out of existence and could not be used, as under this bill, to bull and bear prices of commodities and securities just as they see fit.

By the privileges of this bill or in its necessary operations the national banks must issue all the paper money used by the people, and to better enable them to do so this bill makes such changes in the national banking laws as will make it more profitable for the national banks to issue their notes than under existing law. By this bill we give them a complete monopoly of furnishing all the paper money used by the people and increase the profit of note issuing in addition to the monopoly conferred. A more dangerous power or one fraught with greater possibilities of evil can not be imagined by the mind of man than this surrender by the people of the right to issue the paper money needed in their business and turn it over to the rapacity and greed of banking corporations.

Mr. Chairman, what would Old Hickory say of this bill, could he speak from the precincts of the tomb? What would Lincoln say of the prostration and surrender of his party to the uses and purposes of purely money-making capitalistic combinations?

The more standard money we have the better are the prices of products and the wages of labor. As the supply of metallic money can not, in the nature of things, be regulated by any human effort or foresight and must depend to a great extent upon the mere accident of discovery, we contend that greater stability can be had by the use of the two metals than one. Hence we are bimetallists and do not favor the single standard of either gold or silver, but believe that it is to the best interest of all mankind to make standard money metals out of both gold and silver.

If this bill is not class legislation I will be glad to know what it takes to constitute such legislation.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am fully aware and fully recognize what a waste of words it is to stand here and further discuss this measure. It has been made a caucus measure and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has told us that there was a unanimous vote in the Republican caucus in its favor, not even one dissenting voice. This bill is the consummation of English effort for the past twenty years. It is the realization of the hopes of Lombard and Wall streets. It is the beginning of the end of our present form of government, the tottering to the downfall of our free institutions, and if not prevented by an aroused and awakened people there will be but little use for our further assembling in this Hall as the people's representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, two quotations are so replete with thoughts directly applicable to my personal convictions in regard to the great measure under consideration that I intend to quote and analyze them somewhat fully:

I. Two things, men of Athens, are characteristic of a well-disposed citizen—so may I speak of myself and give the least offense. In authority, his constant aim should be the dignity and preeminence of the commonwealth; in all times and circumstances his spirit should be loyal.—Demosthenes's Oration on the Crown.

II. It is good, also, not to try experiments in states, except the necessity be urgent or the utility evident; and well to beware that it be the reformation that draweth on the change, and not the desire of change that pretendeth the reformation.—Bacon's Essay on Innovations.

I desire, however, Mr. Chairman, above all else, at the commencement of my argument, to impress my colleagues on this side of the House with these facts, to wit: That I do not intend to criticize their sincerity of conviction toward any financial opinions different from those I entertain. I do not intend to stir up or create any division among ourselves, and, finally, above all else, I do not arrogate to myself that I am right and you wrong, but I do assert, and will endeavor to prove, later in my argument, that the money plank of the Chicago platform demanding the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 was not in harmony with the tenets of the Democratic party and departed from the traditional policy of its founders and greatest men. In pursuance of this plan I have divided my argument into three sections.

First. "In authority his constant aim should be the dignity and preeminence of the commonwealth."

Second. "It is good, also, not to try experiment in states, except the necessity be urgent or the utility evident," etc.

Third. "In all times and circumstances his spirit should be loyal."

We who represent in this House the American people have a rare opportunity to advance the dignity and preeminence of the Republic. We should aim to have our nation first in all things. We should strive to make laws so liberal, so just, so fair, so sound that the people whom we represent should be able to pursue their course toward the strengthening of the Republic without fear of commercial disquietude or national disaster; then we having performed our duty, the wheels and spindles of our mills would busily hum, the rhythmic click of the reaping machines would be heard across our table-lands and plains, the merry songs of the cotton pickers would permeate the balmy air of the sunny South, while merchant, artisan, clerk, would rejoice in this national prosperity, and the busy mart of the entire commercial world would be forced to acknowledge their dependence upon American industry. A commercial elysium, such as this just pictured, however, could never last unless based upon an indestructible, sound, and safe currency. And such a currency must be based upon the standard of the nations with whom we have our greatest transactions, and this standard is gold. [Applause.]

Commerce has of recent years preferred gold. Legislative action has not forced silver to the wall; commercial action has. The merchant says, "Silver has now become an article of commerce, rising and falling in price, as do all other articles of commerce dependent upon laws of supply and demand. Its value, therefore, is fluctuating constantly; hence it is undesirable as a standard of value."

Mr. Chairman, I go even further and assert that in spite of the most favorable legislative acts and bolstering propositions silver has, through this action of the commercial world, declined in value.

Under the act of February 28, 1878, known as the Bland-Allison Act, the said act being "to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender quality," we find a direct attempt on the part of Congress to aid silver theorists, but what happened? Instead of increasing the value of silver per ounce it caused, through the increased production of the mines, its depreciation from $1.2048 per ounce in 1878 to $0.9668 in 1890. For complete data and statistics under this act see the following table from the Report of the Director of the Mint for 1894, page 17:

Consider carefully the enormous total, 201,272,018 ounces, and the tremendous cost thereof, $308,279,260. This act, however, was a failure, as it did not increase the price of silver, and again the free-silver theorists came to Congress and suggested another line of action for the benefit of the white metal. And so the Sherman Act of July 14, 1890, became the law. The silver men were now very happy, for at last they thought the Government had done the right thing by them. This act provided for "directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes." From the following table, taken from page 17 of the Report of the Director of the Mint for 1894, we find another remarkable condition of affairs. The Government, taking nearly the entire output of the mines of the United States, and thus creating a tremendous demand, was unable to keep up the price per ounce.

Amount, cost, average price, and bullion value of the silver dollar of silver purchased under act of July 14, 1890.

[The quotations are taken from the Mint report.]

During this time the Government has bought 168,674,682 ounces of silver, at a cost of $155,931,002 gold, and the price declined a little more than 1 cent per ounce per month average. In October, 1893, the buying was stopped by the repeal of the purchase act.

From the birth of the Sherman Act of June 17, 1890, to its death, October, 1893, what occurred to so tremendously upset business circles, create panics, cause commercial failures, and capital to become more timid? The silver advocates promised stability of prices and evenness of wages under the Sherman law, but, on the contrary, from such financial legislation disaster quickly spread throughout the land. Without desiring to burden you, my colleagues, with figures difficult to remember, I desire to submit the following table, taken from Bradstreet's report of 1896, in proof of what I have just said:

From this table we glean that from 1891 to 1893, inclusive, over 3,000,000 wage-earners were thrown out of employment; 38,000 business establishments forced into liquidation, with liabilities of $700,000,000 and assets of only $419,000,000, showing an actual loss of $281,000,000. Notice, then, the decrease, after the repeal of the act, of $250,000,000 in the amount of liabilities.

Mr. Chairman, I have searched the records and read the figures of reliable statisticians, and assert now, without fear of contradiction, that during the commercial history of Great Britain, France, Germany, and the United States for the years of the nineteenth century there were not any three successive years when commerce and commercial enterprises suffered so severely.

Upon whom, then, did these disasters most largely fall? The great merchant and manufacturer? No; but upon the merchant and manufacturer of modest means and small capital, for the failures under $5,000 in 1891 were 62 per cent of the total; in 1892, 64 per cent, and in 1893, 58 per cent, while over $5,000 and under $30,000, 27 per cent was the total in 1891, 28 per cent in 1892, and 27 per cent in 1893, and collectively, under $30,000, 87 per cent in 1891, 91 per cent in 1892, and 87 per cent in 1893. What do the figures mean, my colleagues? They mean that our Democratic constituents suffered infinitely more than did the Republicans, for our party consists largely of the men of small means and modest capital.

This is why I stand here advocating the passage of this Republican gold measure, for I know that every legislative attempt of recent years for the benefit of silver has injured the Democrat, the man of small means. If, in spite of legislative action, silver refused to remain at a ratio of 16 to 1, what is the cause for the decline? Nothing is easier to answer. It is, as stated before, the old law of supply and demand. [Applause.]

It is recognized by every student of economics that when the demand for anything exceeds the supply prices hold firm and high, and the greater the demand and the smaller the supply the greater the price. On the other hand, the smaller the demand and the greater the supply the lower the price. This statement requires no argument, no illustration.

The silver theorists say under free coinage at a ratio of 16 to 1 the United States would say to the world, We propose to pay $1.20 per ounce for all your silver, and in addition we will coin it free of charge. Mr. Chairman, this is very pretty in theory, but what would inevitably follow? The United States would have some $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 of the world's silver, in addition to the annual mine output, thrown upon it for coinage, and many, many years would pass before the mint could possibly coin this inconceivable amount. Bonds would of necessity be issued to pay for the bullion; they would be silver bonds at high rates of interest, and would unquestionably sell below par, for the financial world would know beyond any shadow of doubt that the United States could not continue purchasing silver and meet its obligations with gold standard countries, its chief customers. Following the Gresham law, all the gold would leave us. Now, what would happen? Panic would follow panic, the demand for silver would decline through the demand of the whole people for an immediate change of a false financial system, and the price per ounce of the white metal would go tumbling down.

Look at it in another light. As stated a moment ago, our mints could not coin the silver in many years. The world would soon learn this and would then stop sending her silver to us, with this inevitable result, that the United States, unable to take silver, and the world unable to unload, the price would fall, for silver would again be forced into the highways of commerce and the commercial price would then take the place of the legislative price. In a nutshell the argument results in simply this: "We can not create anything by legislation; we can not keep two kinds of money at a parity by legislative action; we can not, most powerful though we are, perform impossibilities." We can, however, do what other commercial nations have done, and that is, establish gold as a standard and coin silver as it is needed and demanded, redeeming it in gold when necessary.

My silver colleagues may say, Why was it that for two thousand three hundred years the ratio between silver and gold varied only between 1.4 to 1 and 15 to 1; and then after 1876 the ratio varied from 17.88 to 1 in that year to 35 to 1 in 1898? In the short time allotted me it is impossible to take up the argument earlier than 1893. In that year $3 worth of silver was being produced for every dollar's worth of gold. From 1899 to 1830 the world's greatest producers of silver, the South American countries, were undergoing constant upheavals and wars with each other. Silver production fell off tremendously while the production of gold actually increased. In 1848 came the discovery of gold in California, and in 1851 in Australia.

A great demand for gold was the result and the demand has continued ever since, while the demand for silver as a monetary standard has become constantly less. I do not believe this was caused by the establishment of the gold standard in Germany, the failure of the Latin Union, or the United States act of 1873; for the true explanation of the 35 to 1 ratio of 1898 is that the commercial nations of the world have adopted gold for their standard of value on account of its greater convenience, greater intrinsic value, and greater stability in price, and have discarded silver on account of its becoming more and more each day an article of commerce, and consequently more liable to fluctuations similar to those of all other articles of trade.

As an additional evidence that the commercial nations of the world have determined to no longer continue silver as a monetary standard of value I would cite that England demonetized silver in 1816; the German Empire adopted the gold basis in 1873; in 1872 the Scandinavian Union, comprising Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, was formed on a gold basis; in 1874 silver was demonetized by the Latin Union, comprising the important countries of France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, and Greece; in 1875 the coinage of silver was suspended by Holland; in 1876 the same was done by Russia, and in 1898 this last country adopted the gold standard. This was followed a few months later by the establishment of the gold standard in Japan. Thus we can see that the nations controlling the commerce of the world, recognizing the changed condition of commercial transactions, have decided to adopt the gold standard. It is certainly the perfection of wisdom for the United States now to fall in line, for our merchants prefer gold to silver, and that which the people want they will have; that which they do not want they will not take.

The next step in this argument is the consideration of the act of 1873. It has been called a crime, and, too, it has been oftentimes said that very few, if any, of those voting upon this measure understood its import. There never was a measure passed by Congress more fully or lengthily debated, and I have too much respect for the mentality of the Senators and Congressmen of that epoch to accuse them of not understanding the tenets of that act. The original draft of this bill was submitted to experts the world over. Their answers can easily be found in House Executive Document No. 307. I have read a great number of them, and not one, but many, responders mention that it would probably demonetize silver.

On pages 2306, 2308, volume 102, of the Congressional Globe, Mr. Hooper made a long and learned speech upon the measure and said in relation to the reduction of weight of silver dollars from 412½ to 384 grains that—

The silver dollar of 412½ grains, by reason of its bullion or intrinsic value being greater than its nominal value, long since ceased to be a coin of circulation, and it is melted by manufacturers of silveware. It does not circulate now in commercial transactions with any country. * * *

Is not the above speech perfectly clear as to the treatment the silver dollar was to receive? Without going any deeper into the consideration of this act I simply submit the following summary of procedure of the act of 1873:

In addition I desire to say that this bill was printed eleven times by order of Congress and twice by the deputy Comptroller of the Currency. Committees during five sessions discussed it, and 66 columns of Senatorial eloquence and 78 columns of Representative oratory were published at the time in the Congressional Globe.

Does not this debate seem to have been most exhaustive and thoroughly frank, honest, and open?

Mr. Chairman, the United States has become a great power. Our export commerce grows larger year by year and the trade balances more favorable. Our bonds and securities are held and respected in every land. Our international dealings grow more harmonious each succeeding day. Foreign capital now approaches our shores to aid in our industrial development, and the magnificence of our national dignity and preeminence demands that we pay our obligations to the world in the coin with which it pays us, and this coin is gold.

IT IS GOOD ALSO NOT TO TRY EXPERIMENTS, ETC.

My colleagues, this is not an experiment in finance; its utility is evident, and it is the reformation in the method of transacting the business of the world that has brought about the change of the money standard of the world.

Has the dollar appreciated, prices consequently falling lower and lower, or have machinery and the vast increase of production over population, with the resultant lowering of consumption, caused the decline in prices? Has the wage earner benefited or suffered on account of the increased purchasing power of the dollar? If the gold standard, upon which we practically are to-day, has been for the good of the greatest number, it has been a success; if not, a failure.

I believe, sir, that, even conceding, which I do not, that the dollar has appreciated, the laborer or wage earner has benefited more than the capitalist, for with the falling prices brought about by over and increased production to consumption and by the immutable laws of supply and demand he is able to purchase in 1899 almost double the necessities and commodities purchasable in 1873 with the same dollar; while, on the other hand, the capitalist has been forced to accept lower rates of interest upon moneys invested in various enterprises and upon real estate. Depreciation of the dollar and consequently higher prices is certain to injure the wage earner and benefit the capitalist. Wages are slow to rise and excepting in times of greatest prosperity the increase of wages to the artisan, mechanic, and clerk would not be proportionate to the increased prices asked for everything necessary for their comfort and those dependent upon them for maintenance.

One step farther. I can not see, therefore, how any of our class of citizens, farmer, manufacturer, or otherwise, could be benefited by a depreciating dollar, for the increased prices received for their products would not be more than the increase of charge for everything they might have to buy. An eminent Democrat, Warner, said, "All trade is barter, and money is only the medium of exchange. In other words, money is only the medium through which what we sell becomes converted into what we buy." This is so clear that it requires no proof. Therefore, the wage-earner having only his skill as a medium of exchange, converts it into money. The exhaustive tables prepared by the Senate committee a few years ago proved that the wage-earner has been a great beneficiary through the present standard. In the following table prices, wages, and purchasing power are carefully and fully considered:

Purchasing power of wages	84.4	90.6	86.6	100	66	114.1	124.1	132.3	162	172.1

Under average of prices in 1870 as compared with 1860 as a unit, meat stood at 174.3; cloths and clothing, 139.4; house furnishings, 121.6; miscellaneous (15 articles), 143.6; average of all wages, 162.2; purchasing power of wages, 114.1.

Comparing the above with 1890, we at that time being on a gold basis, we find meat stood at 99.6; cloths and clothing, 82.4; house furnishings, 69.5; miscellaneous (15 articles), 89.7; average of all wages, 158.9; purchasing power of wages, 172.1.

To the last two items in each table I desire to call special attention. Wages decreased less than 3 per cent, while the purchasing power of the wage-earners' medium of exchange increased a trifle over 50 per cent. The truth of this economic axiom is thus demonstrated: "Appreciation of the dollar in which wages are paid, and consequently lower prices, is, therefore, constantly and certainly to the advantage of the wage-earner. Depreciation of the dollar, and consequently higher prices, is always and certainly to his damage."

Now, on the other hand, we will consider how the capitalist has been affected. He is receiving lower rates of interest upon mortgages, bonds of the United States, or bonds of any State or municipality. The census of 1880 shows that of real-estate mortgages 46.6 per cent were at 5, 6, and 7 per cent interest; 24.6 per cent at 8 per cent; 27.2 per cent at 9, 10, and 12 per cent. In 1898 it was estimated that 77 per cent of the real-estate mortgages of the United States were under 6 per cent interest—some at 3 per cent—20 per cent under 8 per cent interest, and 3 per cent over 8 per cent, the class being largely speculative mortgages. The rates of interest on railroad, Government, and other bonds in 1873 were from 6 to 10 per cent per annum, even when payable in coin, while in 1898 the rates of interest on first-class gold bonds were only from 3 to 4 per cent per annum. This interest lesson is true of every country on the gold standard, while rates of interest in silver countries have either remained stationary as compared with 1873 or else become higher. Thus the wage-earner and not the capitalist is proved to be the greatest beneficiary under the gold standard.

Depreciation in prices has been caused by increased production and decreased consumption—the old law of supply and demand again.

The thought for this argument is taken from the speech delivered in the Fifty-second Congress, March 16, 1892, by the greatest Democratic orator of recent years. Mr. Bryan said:

You must attribute it to the inventive genius that has multiplied a thousand times in many instances the strength of a single arm, and enables us to do with one man what fifty men could not do fifty years ago. That is what has brought down prices in this country and everywhere.

The discovery of steam power and the wonderful machinery development in connection therewith has increased the productiveness of manual labor many hundredfold. The last half of this century has witnessed greater developments than any preceding five half centuries; it has brought into our economic system a condition of affairs never dreamed of by our ancestors, and it is the result of these changed conditions that forced the world to adopt a new monetary standard. The steady growth of factories and cultivated fields, increased transportation facilities, the spreading out of enterprise to all portions of the world has made competition keener than ever known in earlier times. Mulhall's statistics on the commerce of the world are so marvelous that they are like unto a fanciful story from the Arabian Nights.

Commerce of the world since 1850.

In forty-seven years—1850 to 1897—commerce increased from $3,800,000,000 to $18,500,000,000, an increase of over fourteen and a half billions of dollars, or 480 per cent. During this time, in the nine leading commercial countries of the world, the population increased only 52 per cent and the commerce 222 per cent.

Country.	1850.	1860.	1870.	1880.	1890.
Great Britain	27.7	29.3	31.8	35.2	37.9
France	35.8	37.4	36.1	37.7	38.3

United States	23.2	31.4	38.5	50.1	62.6
Total	255.2	281.4	305.1	347	388.6

The following computations show the ratio of increase in commerce and in population, respectively, on a comparison of 1854 with each of the succeeding decennial periods:

	Commerce.	Population.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Increase of 1864 over 1854	68.12	10.23
Increase of 1874 over 1854	172	19.55
Increase of 1884 over 1854	207	35.95
Increase of 1893 over 1854	222	52.27

The world's increase of supply in four branches of commerce is given in the following table:

Products.	1840.	1850.	1860.	1898.
Coal	tons	81,000,000	530,000,000	630,000,000
Iron	do.	4,422,000	27,157,000	30,570,000
Steel	do.	71,000	(1897)	24,000,000
Cotton	million pounds	1,310		5,900

These Aladdin-like figures show most clearly why prices have fallen—population increasing about 55 per cent since 1850, commerce increasing 408 per cent. Prices remained higher prior to 1873 unquestionably because millions of dollars were being expended and thousands of men employed (in fact, the demand for labor was greater than supply) in the construction of the enterprises which made the later development and overproduction of commerce a certainty. The following table (Mulhall's) on the increase of steam power is a volume of argument in itself:

The world's steam power since 1850.

	Horsepower.
1840	1,650,000
1890	50,150,000
1896	66,100,000

From 1,650,000 horsepower in 1840 to 66,100,000 horsepower in 1896.

Thus the statement of Mr. Bryan that inventive genius has brought down prices everywhere is absolutely demonstrated.

I regret that I have not had time for the discussion of the Gresham law; the great increase in production of the gold supply of the world, which has created an exceedingly strong influence toward my support of this bill, or our commerce with gold-standard countries as compared with the commerce of silver-standard countries. In Appendixes A and B will be found the figures on production and commerce in extenso. In conclusion of this, the theoretical argument, I will only add that in the next century the United States, located midway between Europe and Asia, will become the financial center of the world if now we establish firmly the gold standard.

"IN ALL TIMES AND CIRCUMSTANCES HIS SPIRIT SHOULD BE LOYAL."

I am proud that I owe allegiance to the Democratic party; and, sir, in earnestness of loyalty to the principles of that party there is not a Democrat on the floor of this House more sincere than am I. I am proud, too, of the history of the Democracy. It is older than any other political party in this union of States. It has many great victories recorded to its credit, and while it has suffered severe defeats, it mattered not how crushing the blow or wild the tempest, it has weathered every political storm, and in the campaign soon to occur, if the wise leaders among the silver and gold wings of the party will but unite on the broad lines of Democratic compromise, conciliation, concession, we will march in serried ranks to the polls next November and give to the opposition party a battle royal.

The Democratic party, win or lose in 1900, will not be destroyed, for those fundamental principles enunciated by Jefferson, reaffirmed by Jackson, and reiterated by the Democratic national convention of 1876 are the political sheet anchors of our hope for the twentieth century. And these principles are, the recognition of equal rights and justice to all classes of our people; one law for the rich man and the laborer alike; no governmental paternalism to assist in the material wealth of the individual, but the granting of opportunity to all men to work out their own successes without governmental aid or restriction as long as the rights of every other individual are sacredly respected; freedom of speech, the press, religion, and debate, and the honest payment of our debts and sacred preservation of the public faith. These, my colleagues, are the indestructible planks of the Democratic platform of principles, and Jefferson, the greatest of all Democrats, summed them up in this paragraph:

They should be the creed of our political faith, the text of civic instruction, the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust; and should we wander from them in moments of error or alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety.—Richardson's Messages and Papers, Volume I, page 324.

I am equally proud of the great men who have made the Democracy famous in the history of our country—Jefferson, Randolph, Madison, Jackson, Benton, Monroe, Polk, Calhoun, Seymour, Tilden, and Russell of Massachusetts. Many of these men were, however, not in harmony with their party on every proposition. Randolph fought the foreign policy of Jefferson and the Democracy in and out of Congress; Calhoun was bitterly opposed to the Mexican war and the policy of his party and President Polk in connection therewith; Randall, though elected by his colleagues to the great office of Speaker of the House of Representatives, was an outspoken advocate of a protective tariff, in opposition to the views held by his party; and William E. Russell, the idol of the Massachusetts Democracy, was opposed to the financial plank of the Chicago platform. These great men all thought they were right, and they have never been considered less the adherents of Democracy for their action; so the right taken by them I take now, and that right is simply what I consider for the best interests of my Democratic constituents.

The Democratic party prior to 1896 was always known as the hard-money party, and I propose to show that were the illustrious men whom I have mentioned alive at the present time they would have been gold bugs, if I may use that term. I also propose to show from the planks of the platform of every Democratic convention from 1836 to 1892, wherever finance is mentioned it carries with it a demand for upholding the national credit. I also desire to quote the actual language of Jefferson, Jackson, Benton, Tilden, and Russell.

Jefferson said:

Just principles will lead us to disregard legal proportions altogether; to inquire into the market price of gold in the several countries with which we shall principally be connected in commerce and to take an average from them.

Note here the words "disregard legal proportion" and "market price." Jefferson apparently did not believe in legislative ability to keep up or make a ratio between gold and silver. He also said:

The laws are consequently so formed and administered as to bear with equal weight and favor on all, restraining no man in the pursuits of honest industry, and securing to everyone the property which that acquires.—Richardson's Messages and Papers, Volume I, page 407.

Free coinage, reducing the purchasing power of the dollar, would certainly not be securing to our millions of savings-banks depositors the property which they have acquired.

President Madison said (page 467, Volume I, Richardson's Messages and Papers), in his first inaugural message:

Indulging no passion which trespasses on the rights or the repose of other nations, it has been the true glory of the United States to cultivate peace by observing justice.

A few lines further on in the same document he said the United States should—preserve in their full energy the other salutary provisions in behalf of private and personal rights, and should promote by authorized means improvements friendly to external as internal commerce.

The gold standard certainly harmonizes most thoroughly with these statements.

President Jackson said, in describing the money of the Constitution (page 586, Volume II, Richardson's Messages and Papers):

Congress have established a mint to coin money and passed laws to regulate the value thereof. The money so coined, with its value so regulated, and such foreign coins as Congress may adopt are the only currency known to the Constitution.

Gentlemen, is it not easy to see from this that the money coined at the mints—gold, silver, nickel, and copper alike—is the money of the Constitution? The bill under consideration does not depart from the Constitution, but makes the money of the Constitution more valuable to all the people, for it bases it upon the most stable and reliable standard, gold. [Applause.]

Jackson's eighth annual message, pages 246, 247, Richardson's Messages and Papers:

It is apparent from the whole context of the Constitution, as well as the history of the times which gave birth to it, that it was the purpose of the convention to establish a currency consisting of the precious metals. These, from their peculiar properties which render them the standards of value in all other countries, were adopted in this as well to establish its commercial standard in reference to foreign countries by a permanent rule as to exclude the use of a mutable medium of exchange. Such as of certain agricultural commodities recognized by the statutes of some States as a tender for debts or the still more pernicious expedient of a paper currency. * * *

Variableness must ever be the characteristic of a currency of which the precious metals are not the chief ingredient, or which can be expanded or contracted without regard to the principles which regulate the value of those metals as a standard in the general trade of the world. With us such issues constitute such a currency, and must ever do so until they are made dependent on those just proportions of gold and silver as a circulating medium which experience has proved to be necessary not only in this but in all other commercial nations. * * *

When thus, by the depreciation in consequence of the quantity of paper in circulation, wages as well as prices become exorbitant, it is soon found that the whole effect of the adulteration is a tariff on our home industry for the benefit of the countries where gold and silver circulate and maintain uniformity and moderation in prices.

Note carefully that President Jackson said "just proportions of gold and silver." This is so absolutely clear and plain that it requires no further argument.

President Jackson's fight against the United States Bank was solely on account of the political machine it established, the careless handling of the public moneys, the recklessness of the officers, and the fluctuating value of the paper money. In no manner was it a fight against gold or silver at any ratio, but against an unreliable paper money. President Jackson said in his message December 2, 1834:

The progress of our gold coinage is creditable to the officers of the Mint and promises, too, in a short period to furnish the country with a sound and portable currency.

Not a word here about silver. I sincerely wish that all classes of Democrats could read all President Jackson's financial messages. No evening could be more profitably spent, for there is a vast amount of wisdom in each and every one of them.

We now come to what another great Democrat had to say on the subject, and I allude to Senator Benton, of Missouri, who said, in the Twenty-fourth Congress, second session, January, 1837 (Appendix to the Congressional Globe, page 146):

Gold is the enemy of paper; it keeps it down when the paper has a right to demand gold; and thus a paper currency founded upon gold, as it is in England, will always be kept more within bounds than a paper currency founded upon silver. Silver is too cumbersome to hold paper in check. A person would not wish to change even a twenty-dollar note into silver to carry in his pocket, but would gladly change it into gold.

If this quotation does not declare and make Senator Benton a Gold Democrat, my understanding of the English language is most faulty.

The longest message ever sent to Congress on a financial subject was that of President Van Buren to the special session of Congress, convened September 4, 1837. (Richardson's Messages and Papers, Volume III, pages 324-346.) It is too long for me even to attempt any quotations; and as each paragraph depends on the other for connected sense and argument, I would be forced to quote the entire message, so I therefore simply allude to it.

The money planks of the convention of 1876 were drawn by Samuel J. Tilden, and to them I will refer under national-convention planks.

William E. Russell, in the convention at Chicago, 1896, said: I did not believe I should have lived to see the day when these great principles (the fundamental) would be forgotten in a Democratic convention.

Governor Russell thought, as do I, that the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 was a departure from Democratic principles.

These are a few of the utterances of great Democrats upon the financial question. Next I desire to give in full every plank of every Democratic national platform that can, in any manner, be construed as alluding to the financial question. Prior to 1848 no declaration in the platforms was made on the currency. In this year, however, at a Democratic convention held at Baltimore, the eighth plank of the platform, among other declarations, said:

That the fruits of the great political triumph of 1844 have fulfilled the hopes of the Democracy of the Union in protecting the currency and labor of the country from ruinous fluctuation.—Stanwood's History of Presidential Elections, page 109.

This is a simple declaration of pride on the part of the Democracy of 1848 in the fact that the currency was protected from ruinous fluctuations.

In the Charleston convention of 1860 the first plank of the platform was:

Democratic principles are unchangeable in their nature when applied to the same subject-matter.

Mr. Chairman, this plank of thirty-nine years ago exactly expresses my sentiments to-day, for I do not believe that any of the fundamental principles of a party can be changed by the dictum of a single national convention.

In the convention of 1868, held in Tammany Hall, New York City, on the 4th day of July, the fifth plank was:

One currency for the Government and the people, the laborer and the officeholder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bondholder.

The sixth plank contained this:

The credit of the Government and the currency made good.

This declaration meant most absolutely that the currency of the people was to be the best obtainable and of equal standing and equal value with every other currency the world over, and the credit of the Government was to be unimpeachable in the eyes of the nations of the world without equivocation and without technical declaration.

In the Greeley campaign the Liberal Republican convention at Cincinnati, in plank 7, said:

The public credit must be sacredly maintained, and we denounce repudiation in every form and guise.

I have simply quoted this plank from this platform because many Democrats of that day voted for Mr. Greeley. The straight Democratic convention at Louisville, however, in its fourth plank, resolved:

That the Democratic party is held together by the cohesion of time-honored principles which they will never surrender in exchange for all the offices which a President can confer.

Are not hard money, a stable currency, and a nonfluctuating standard time-honored principles of the Democratic party?

We now arrive at the great platform of the Democracy for the year 1876, and I believe that with the exception of Jefferson's original declaration of faith, the greatest platform ever adopted by the Democracy, the greatest declaration of principle was that of the convention of 1876. As said before, Mr. Tilden drafted the following planks, and I would ask you, my colleagues, to consider well their import:

Reform is necessary to establish a sound currency, restore the public credit, and maintain the national honor. We denounce the failure, for all these eleven years of peace, to make good the promise of the legal-tender note, which are a changing standard of value in the hands of the people. * * * We denounce that party which has made no advance toward resumption * * * and, while annually professing to intend a speedy return to specie payments, has annually enacted fresh hindrances thereto. We denounce the resumption clause of the act of 1875 and demand its repeal.

We demand a system of preparation by wise finance which shall enable the nation soon to assure the world of its perfect ability and its perfect readiness to meet any of its promises at the call of the creditor entitled to payment. We believe such a system, * * * creating at no time an artificial scarcity of currency, and at no time alarming the public mind into a withdrawal of that wester machinery of credit, by which 95 per cent of all business transactions are performed—a system open, public, and inspiring general confidence—* * * would * * * renew in all its natural resources the prosperity of the people.

During the deliberations of this national Democratic convention on the 28th of June, 1876, Sunset Cox, of New York, said in a speech delivered before the delegates in convention assembled, and in speaking of the redemption law, that—

I voted in the committee to which I belong for the repeal of the redemption law. [Loud applause.] I voted for it because it did not provide for the resumption of a specie payment. It provided for silver, and we passed silver bills for change. They [meaning the Republicans] were afraid to take the responsibility, and we [Congress] demonetized silver, but it is a different thing as to gold and resumption.—From the New York Herald, June 28, 1876.

I also desire to refer to a speech of Senator Voorhees, of Indiana, in the same convention, in the second column, page 4, New York Herald, June 29, 1876, where he practically declares for the gold standard.

There can be no misconception, no misunderstanding of what this means; for as the bright stars of heaven shine out as beautiful beacons in the sky, so do these marvelous planks stand out as the brightest stars in the sky of the Democracy. The financial planks here drafted were culled from seventy years of Democratic wisdom upon the subject, and where Samuel J. Tilden stood in 1876 I stand now, and am not ashamed to acknowledge it either here or before my constituents.

We now come to the election of 1880. The Democratic convention of that year was held at Cincinnati on the 22d of June, and the third plank of the platform was:

We demand honest money, consisting of gold and silver and paper convertible into coin on demand; the strict maintenance of the public faith, State and national.

The legal ratio between gold and silver in that year was very much nearer the commercial ratio than it is to-day, and then silver was infinitely a more honest money than it is at the present time.

The next Democratic convention was held at Chicago, July 8, 1884, and in the third plank of that platform we find the following:

We believe in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution, and a circulating medium convertible into such money without loss.

Note now that it was in this selection that the first direct "straddle" plank on the money question was made, and the plank just quoted clearly showed that the Democracy of that time had serious doubts of the possibility and practicability of gold and silver circulating as money without loss, one to the other.

In the convention of 1888 at St. Louis, the 5th of June, we note a strange fact, that no mention whatever is made in the platform on the currency question.

We now draw down to the convention of 1892, and plank 7 of that platform reads as follows:

We denounce the Republican legislation known as the Sherman Act of 1890 as a cowardly makeshift, fraught with possibility of danger in the future which should make all its supporters, as well as its author, anxious for its speedy repeal. We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discrimination against either metal or charge for mintage.

Now note this remarkable declaration:

But the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, or be adjusted through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the market and in payment of debts; and we demand that all paper currency shall be kept at par with and redeemable in such coins.

Note "redeemable in such coin;" that is, a coin having a parity equal in every market of the world.

We insist upon this policy as specially necessary for the protection of the farmers and laboring classes, the first and most defenseless victims of unstable money and a fluctuating currency.

Upon this plank and one other, the tariff for revenue only, we went before the country and won the greatest victory in the history of the Democracy since the election of President Monroe.

Between 1890 and 1892 the storm clouds commenced to gather. A new movement has sprung up in the West, growing stronger, apparently, day by day. And this movement finally crystallized into the People's Party. In 1892 it held its first convention at Omaha, on July 3. And we now notice for the first time in American politics the most radical declaration ever made by any of all the parties which have existed since the commencement of our Government, and this departure was the following extreme declaration of the Populists on the money question:

Plank A.—We demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1.

We now approach the Chicago platform, and in that platform, in the third plank, we find that the great Democratic party has taken verbatim the plank of the Populist party of 1892 on the currency question, and that plank is:

We demand the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1.

As shown before from the extensive quotations which I have made from the various national platforms of the Democratic party, no such departure ever occurred before. In conclusion, my colleagues, I simply desire to point out to you the fruits of the election of 1896. We lost New York State by over 260,000; New Jersey, which never but once before went for a Republican candidate for President, by over 80,000; Connecticut by over 50,000, and in addition Kentucky, Maryland, Delaware, West Virginia, and Indiana were placed in the Republican column.

The popular majority throughout the whole Union, 600,000 against us, was the greatest ever recorded against any party in this country. Above all else the Democracy has to-day not a governor, not a State legislature, not a United States Senator, in or from any State north of Virginia and Kentucky or east of the Mississippi River. No such condition of affairs existed before in our political history, for in the war election of 1864 New Jersey, Delaware, and Kentucky held true to the Democracy, and several Democratic governors and legislatures were elected. Even in the disastrous Greeley campaign of 1872 Delaware cast its vote for the regular Democratic candidate, Mr. Hendricks. The year 1896 was indeed a disastrous year for the Democracy.

My Democratic colleagues, I plead with you to meet the gold Democrats part way. We do not ask an ell; we will accept an inch, for the Democratic party has a great mission to perform. It must be more than a minority party; it must be a strong and powerful opposition party, for the best interests of the country can only be served by having the only two great parties, the Democratic and the Republican, so closely matched in voting strength that when one does wrong the other will win.

Drop the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 from the next national platform, and we can win. Drop it not, and we will as certainly lose. Instead of rainbow chasing in Republican States, why not bring back into line the Democratic States of New Jersey, Connecticut, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, West Virginia, and New York? [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, the only fault that I could possibly find with the bill under consideration lies in the fact that it is not quite drastic enough. The bill in one of its sections provides that the greenbacks, so called, may be taken to the Treasury and reissued in exchange for gold. If I had my way in respect to the greenback, I would provide that when it is returned to the Treasury and paid in gold it should be canceled, and I should insist at this time upon a provision of that kind if I could see any way by which the currency of the country could be preserved in its present volume and no contraction take place by reason of such cancellation.

The greenback was never anything but a mere promissory note. It was issued when the Government was in extremis. The Government was compelled to raise men for its Army, to equip them, to provide for a great variety of expenditures that could not be met by the ordinary currency in circulation, and it was therefore necessary to make a forced loan, to issue to the creditor of the Government a promissory note, payable to bearer, and having in it the quality of legal tender, so that the creditor of the Government might compel his creditor to accept it and thus make it current in the ordinary business transactions of the people. But it never lost its character as a note. It never was money except as it was compelled to be by the necessities of the case. Therefore, when it comes back to the Treasury, whence it was issued, I would pay it according to its terms and cancel it.

But, sir, I am aware, as this committee who framed this bill was doubtless aware, that there is a very tender sentiment toward the greenback; that it was issued in time of war, and it has been frequently said that it carried us through the greatest war in modern times. A veneration for it has sprung up, and probably no bill, as I would like this bill, that should provide for its retirement could be passed through either House of Congress. So I content myself by observing that we must accept this bill in all its essential details. Legislators can never seek for the highest possible good, but we are to seek for the highest good possible; and in this case, if we can take the greenback to the Treasury and receive gold for it and then take our gold to the Treasury and receive greenbacks, I suppose no possible harm will be done.

Now, sir, the two leading features in the bill are, first, to establish by positive legislative act the gold standard, and, secondly, a provision that the national banking system shall be preserved by giving to it some more favorable consideration than the present law accords to it. The gold standard is to be established by a positive enactment of law. It has practically been in force half a century. We propose now to have no lingering doubts about it in the minds of our creditors, domestic or foreign, but it will be understood by all persons who see fit to invest in our securities that gold is the money of payment which this Government is pledged to, and there never shall be any question in respect thereto.

We have been dealing with this silver question for twenty years or more. We have done everything in the world to please our friends who are interested in silver mining. We have done everything to please our friends who believe in cheap money. We took a step in that direction when we passed the Bland Act in 1878, which it was fondly hoped would bring some relief. It was a stupendous blunder. The Sherman Act of 1890, which it was supposed would compose all the ills that the financial situation was then laboring under, was another stupendous blunder. The time has at last come when blunders must cease, and we must plant our currency on a bed rock from which it can never be removed; and that is proposed to be done in this bill by removing all possible question in the minds of all people as to the standard by which we propose to live hereafter in this Republic.

Now, then, it is said by our friends on the other side that it is a mistake to adopt the gold standard. Well, what do you propose? Criticism is never good for anything unless it suggests a remedy. The remedy which you propose is the free coinage of silver. There is no question about that. The newspaper press that represents your views, your probable candidate for the Presidency, every utterance that comes from your leaders, all point in one single direction—to the free coinage of silver. Now, then, I maintain that that remedy is altogether worse than the establishment of the gold standard which you complain of and worse than the existing conditions of uncertainty. What is free coinage of silver? What does it mean for this country? All the silver dollars that we now have in circulation were coined on Government account. They have the United States Government behind them. The Government issued them in the first instance, and if there never had been a word said upon the subject, the mere fact that they put those dollars out carries with it an implied obligation to make them good.

The Government has gone further than that, because it has repeatedly declared that the silver issue, and all other issues, shall be maintained at a parity. So that the silver dollar now in circulation, put out by the Government, is just exactly as good as gold. But that is not what you propose. You do not propose to have a silver dollar with the Government standing behind it. You propose to have free coinage. You propose to give to every individual mine owner who takes silver ore out of his mine the right to go to the mints of the Government and have his bullion manufactured into dollars free of expense to him, and then allow him to take those dollars away and put them in circulation. The Government is not behind those dollars.

Nobody is behind them except the silver mine owner, and he is not required to redeem them. If they pass into circulation in the country, they have got to go into circulation on their own intrinsic merits. They do not have the benefit of the Government fiat behind them. If an old lady had a silver teapot or spoon holder that she wanted to have coined, she could go to the mint and have it coined into dollars and take those dollars away. When she has that product made into money and she takes the dollars home and puts them in circulation nobody is behind those dollars except the old woman, and she is not required to make them good. That is the trouble with the free coinage of silver. There is no support given to the dollar. It must circulate on its intrinsic merits, and these are only 50 cents on the dollar, whereas the silver dollar as now put out and issued by the Government circulates at a hundred cents, because it has 50 cents of Government fiat behind it.

Mr. TERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman a short question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. POWERS. I never knew my friend from Arkansas to ask a short question, yet I will give him the opportunity now. [Laughter.]

Mr. TERRY. Suppose we were to close the mints against the free coinage of gold, what do you suppose would be the intrinsic value of the thin bit of gold that you call a gold dollar?

Mr. POWERS. I suppose the gold in a gold dollar is worth 100 cents whether in the shape of a gold dollar or whether it has been through fire and is in a molten shape or wherever you put it.

Mr. TERRY. What makes it worth 100 cents except the fact that it is used in coinage?

Mr. POWERS. Because it is intrinsically worth 100 cents. It will make bosom pins, watches, and a thousand other things.

Mr. TERRY. How great is the use of watches, bosom pins, and such things compared with its use for coinage? If you cut off the demand for coinage purposes, would not it enormously decrease the demand for gold and consequently its value? Will the gentleman chew on that a while? [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, having chewed on that a while, I come to the proposition in this bill as it is presented to this committee to put this Government, in all its fiscal affairs, on a gold standard. In other words, you propose, and I do you no injustice when I say it, because I notice the gentleman from Missouri this afternoon took pains to quote that wonderful saying that made the Democratic candidate so prominent, about the crown of thorns—I say you propose to give to the people of this country a dollar that is intrinsically worth only 50 cents. The proposition in this bill is to give the people of this country a dollar intrinsically worth 100 cents, worth that in this country or any other country. Go to London, Berlin, Manila, you may take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, and the dollar that we propose to give you will buy you a 100-cent dinner wherever you may have occasion to eat.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask one little question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. If the bill passes, will it not be harder for the slaves in Sulu to purchase their freedom?

Mr. POWERS. Well, my friend is getting onto a subject a little outside of this. I suppose my friend is an antiexpansionist, and as he has taken considerable interest in the people of the Sulus I will leave him to deal with the money question when we get them in. We propose to give an honest dollar. Is not that the best for this country? Is it not the best for every class of people in this country? Why, you gentlemen would rather have a double eagle in your pocket than twenty silver dollars. Your candidate for President, if the public press is to be believed, lately made a large investment in gold-bearing bonds, which shows how much faith he has in the gold dollar. I am told that the leading free-silver statesmen in the West that have large means when they make their contracts to be paid in the future always put in a clause that they shall be payable in gold, and that shows what the faith of those people is in this matter.

Therefore I think we may safely say that we are trying to accomplish the greatest good for the greatest number when we are seeking to continue the best possible kind of money that can be circulated. The proposition for free coinage is to carry it on without the aid or consent of any other nation, as if the United States of America was going to do all its business within its own borders. We have to trade with every other civilized nation of the earth. We are trying to extend that trade by every conceivable process of statesmanship that we can invoke. Do you expect if we extend our trade that foreigners will take a currency worth only 50 cents on a dollar? If they do, we shall have to pay double price for their goods.

Now, then, the second feature of the bill which commends itself to my judgment is that section which gives the national bank the right to increase its circulation to a parity with its bonds. And the best part of that argument, in my mind, is the fact that it makes the establishment of State banks impossible. The national banking system is the best system ever devised for the people of this country. I am aware that eminent gentlemen on the other side of the House, and I suppose some on this side, are in favor of State banking institutions. Eminent financial men have applied themselves to the framing of a bill for the purpose of banking by States upon commercial assets. But, sir, I am old enough to remember some of the evils of the State banking system. I believe in the national banking system; I believe in the system that has the supervision and control of the National Government; and the highest benefits that such a system can give is to the bill holders and the great mass of the people.

We have 75,000,000 people in this country, and 74,000,000 of them have no interest whatever in any national bank or any other bank except that the bills issued and paid to them for services, for wages, or for commodities sold by them shall be good where they are circulated. A national-bank bill circulates as readily in Texas or California as in the State of its issue. A bank bill issued in Vermont is good in any other State in the Union. No man looks at the bill when he receives it to see where it comes from. It is a matter of indifference. He knows the bill is good wherever it goes. He simply sees that it is a national-bank bill, and it carries the evidence of its value upon its face, an evidence that can not be ignored.

Now, you can not use a bank bill issued by a private banking institution a hundred and fifty miles from the point of its issue. There will always be a question as to its value. The effect of the bill giving the banks an opportunity to enlarge their circulation and relieve them from the tax heretofore operating against the circulation will preserve the system itself and enhance the volume of the currency.

There is another excellent feature in this section of the bill to which I wish to allude briefly, and that is the method by which you tax the national banks. The present system of a tax on the circulation itself drives it out; it contracts the circulation, because the tax is a heavy one. There is not a bank in the country to-day, I will assert, which has in circulation all the money that it would be entitled to circulate, because it can not afford to pay the tax upon it. The tax of 1 per cent is a very large burden upon the circulation of the banks.

Now, you put the principle on a right footing when you say we will tax the franchises, the capital, the surplus, and the undivided earnings of the bank in place of the circulation itself. You reach the money in the banks by this system without impairing the circulation. Take, for instance, the Chemical Bank of New York, which has a capital of $300,000 and has some twenty millions of deposit. It issues no money; it has no notes in circulation; but under the operation of this bill it may do so without any difficulty whatever. Under the present law that bank pays no taxes to the Government. Under the proposed bill it will pay on its capital surplus and net earnings. Under the proposed bill all national banks will be tempted to take out circulation to the par of their bonds already on hand, and this alone will increase the volume of the currency over $20,000,000.

If the proposal to refund the outstanding bonds of the Government which mature in the next seven or eight years be adopted, banks will doubtless take the new issue as a basis for a still further and greatly increased circulation. That a bond paying 2 per cent interest, payable in express terms in gold coin and running fifty years, can be floated at par no one doubts.

The bill therefore promises great relief to those sections of the country which suffer from lack of currency and at the same time supplies a currency as good as gold. More than 350 national banks have become insolvent in the last thirty years, but no bill holder has ever lost a penny. When we contrast this record with that of any system of State banks ever yet devised, it demonstrates the wisdom of banking upon Government bonds rather than upon such commercial assets as the State would be likely to supply.

National-bank bills circulate freely wherever the American flag floats; State-bank bills continually suffer from an acute attack of homesickness. Besides, if each State is to determine the quality of the assets that shall be pledged for the redemption of its bank issues, our Populistic friends, if in control, will be likely to select assets that have no intrinsic value in their zeal to make something out of nothing.

It has been argued here to-day that this bill will place in the hands of the national banks the entire control of the fiscal interests of the people. Just how such control is to be gained is not pointed out. Will some gentleman who says this be kind enough to point out how the national banks can get any control of his business or mine that could not as easily be secured by State banks? Either bank must of necessity be the servant of the people, and not their master. Either is seeking the patronage of the people, and will therefore be on its good behavior in order to gain it.

Banks of either kind can prosper only as the people are satisfied with their management. Will they lock their vaults and refuse to loan their funds and thus bring distress to the people? You might as well say that the merchant with a store full of goods will decline to sell them in order to distress his customers. Self interest will always avert such dangers.

The demand for State banks is only one phase of the cry for cheap money. It comes from the same source as the cry for the coinage of 50-cent dollars or the demand for irredeemable paper issues. Our people have repudiated all these Populistic demands. It only remains for us to plant ourselves upon the rock of honest money.

The bill under consideration is demanded by the conditions that surround us. Never in our history has such prosperity visited the homes of all our people. Let us, then, make this prosperity secure by giving to the wage-earners, the farmer, the manufacturer, and the tradesmen a dollar that will not disappoint him. Let us remove all those uncertainties respecting our currency that have rested for years like a nightmare upon our business interests. If gold is the recognized standard among the leading nations of the world we can not set it at defiance. We can easily secure our share of the world's supply. Our increasing exports will show the balance of trade on the right side.

Our vast volume of corporate and municipal bonds, with their higher interest rates and their unequalled security, all payable in gold coin, will outbid all other securities in the confidence of investors. The election of President McKinley was a powerful factor in the strengthening of our credit in the exchanges of the world. It was strong evidence that payments by our people were to be made in gold, the only payment that will make international transactions continuously possible.

If now we follow up the advantage gained by that election with the passage of the pending bill we will dispel all fears that our national obligations can be dishonored, and give to business ventures a new hope, to labor a better grounded and more contented faith, and to the new-born prosperity of all our people a better assured endurance.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, a large part of the time allotted to the discussion of this most important measure will, I assume, be occupied by members of the committee which framed it and by members of the House who have served upon the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is proper that this should be so.

For months and years they have been giving unselfishly of their time and efforts in the conscientious investigation and study of the currency question, and are fitted to discuss thoroughly and in detail the important features of this bill. In the short time given to me I do not take the floor with the expectation that I can add much of value to the discussion, but I should not be true to my own feelings nor to the constituency I represent if I did not take advantage of the opportunity offered me to express my appreciation of the work so faithfully performed by the committee, to state my gratification at the fact that this bill is being considered so promptly by the House, and to express publicly my hearty endorsement and approval of the measure itself.

The Republican party, of which I am proud to be a member, has fairly earned the reputation of being a party which does something—which not only makes promises, but keeps them. Throughout its entire life it has shown a steadfast purpose to be true to pledges solemnly made to the people of these United States. One of the pledges made during the Presidential campaign of 1896 was that the Wilson bill should be repealed and a protective-tariff measure be enacted. Without unnecessary delay the President immediately, upon his inauguration, summoned Congress in extraordinary session. The Dingley bill became a law. It was a bill which protected the interests of our manufacturers, our farmers, and our workingmen.

Confidence was restored to business. It is entirely within bounds to say that the prosperity existing throughout our country to-day is unparalleled in its history. The President of the United States in his message to this Congress has called attention to the great increase in the volume and value of our foreign commerce; to the fact that the combined imports and exports for the year are the largest ever shown by a single year in all our history. He stated that our exports for 1899 alone exceeded by more than a billion dollars our imports and exports combined in 1870; that the imports per capita are 20 per cent less than in 1870, while the exports per capita are 58 per cent more than in 1870, and he cites the especially gratifying and significant fact that the only years when the product of our manufactures sold abroad exceeded those bought abroad were 1898 and 1899.

Another solemn promise made by the Republican party during the campaign of 1896 was that "it would remain unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of the country," and that it would keep all our currency as good as gold. The resolution adopted by the Republican party at its national convention that year was as follows:

All our silver and paper currency must be maintained at parity with gold, and we favor all measures designed to maintain inviolably the obligations of the United States, and all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard, the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth.

Whether the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 should be the monetary policy of this country was submitted to the people in the great campaign of 1896 and decided by them in no uncertain tones. They were convinced that such free and unlimited coinage of silver cheated the depositors in our savings banks; that it would lessen the value of the pension of the veterans whose advanced years and increasing disabilities necessitated an increase rather than a decrease of the amount received from the Government; that it would reduce by more than 50 per cent the compensation paid to the wage-earners of this country, and that it would bring absolute demoralization to our business interests. Since that verdict was rendered there has been no question as to the position of the Republican party. It has been and is unqualifiedly in favor of the maintenance of the gold standard. It has held that upon the maintenance of that standard depended our prosperity and the welfare of our people. It has been its aim to adhere to a policy which would have American labor paid in the best money in the world.

In a message to Congress, submitted July 24, 1897, President McKinley said:

Nothing was settled more clearly at the late national election than the determination upon the part of the people to keep their currency stable in value and equal to that of the most advanced nations of the world.

When in 1898 a Democratic Senate adopted a resolution declaring that "it is not in violation of the public faith or in derogation of the rights of the public creditor to restore silver to free coinage at 16 to 1 as a legal tender in payment of the principal and interest of the public debt," a Republican House of Representatives defeated that resolution by a party vote and kept its faith with the people. The resolution was a direct assault upon the public credit of the United States, a desperate effort to establish a policy by which our Government bonds should be paid in a depreciated silver currency.

It was not long after that resolution was offered in Congress that we were plunged into war and our people had a chance to gratefully realize what it meant to a country in time of trial to have a high public credit. At a time like that there is nothing save the valor and patriotism of the people themselves which so sustains a nation. A high public credit permits a government to equip armies, to build ships, to buy ammunition and supplies, and sustain itself, if need be, through long years of warfare until a triumphant peace is secured. It certainly should not be difficult to convince a citizen of Massachusetts who remembers the history of his own State in this respect of the fact that it pays for a State to maintain its credit and conduct its affairs with scrupulous honor.

During the civil war it did not pay the interest on its bonds in depreciated paper money as it might, but in gold. And it was not many years ago that Massachusetts bonds sold in the open market at a higher price than the bonds of the National Government. This is still more significant when we remember that our State bonds were subject to taxation. Then, too, a high public credit saves many millions of dollars to the people, because the Government is enabled to borrow money at a lower rate of interest. It is well for us at this time, when the Government can borrow money at so low a rate of interest, to remember the rates paid by President Cleveland, rates which he was compelled to pay, because it was understood that his party would, if it had the power, force the creditor to take depreciated silver in payment of the principal and interest on those bonds.

The higher rate of interest which we were obliged to pay at that time meant an added tax upon the people amounting to many millions of dollars. Yes, honesty is the best policy. It has been well said "that as no man in his individual transactions can afford to cheat or defraud his creditor, so no great nation like the United States can afford to deal otherwise than honestly with its creditor." On January 27, 1898, President McKinley said:

That the United States Government would not permit a doubt to exist anywhere concerning the stability and integrity of its currency or the inviolability of its obligations of every kind. Whatever effort therefore is required to make the settlement of this vital question clear and conclusive for all time we are bound in good conscience to undertake and, if possible, to realize. It will not suffice for citizens nowadays to say simply that they are in favor of sound money. That is not enough. The people's purpose must be given the vitality of public law.

For the first time since 1896 the Republican party has a majority in the Senate and House of Representatives. This is the first opportunity it has had to enact a measure of monetary reform. It presses forward eagerly to the enactment of such a measure which will give to the people's purpose the vitality of public law. When the bill now under consideration, being a bill "to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States," is passed, as it will be by the close of the present week, then the Republicans of the House will have kept full faith and credit with the people and will have done their part in establishing the present gold dollar as the unit of value, and providing that all forms of our money shall be maintained at a parity.

The report submitted by the committee which framed this measure clearly states that in the consideration of the question it did not seek to arrange a complete scheme of finance, but that it confined its recommendations to those subjects of most pressing demand. The report states that in the opinion of the committee the most urgent subject was the question of a monetary standard and provision for its maintenance. The purpose of that committee, "to strengthen the public credit by the removal of all doubt concerning the policy and practice of the Government relative to the unit of value," and to provide "a complete guaranty of the quality and parity of all our money," has been admirably carried out in the bill now under consideration. Section 1 of the bill provides that the standard unit of value shall be the dollar, which shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold.

Section 2 provides that all interest-bearing obligations of the United States, all United States notes and Treasury notes, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States, as defined in section 1; and that all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

Section 3 provides for a division of issue and redemption in the Treasury Department, where the business of issuing and redeeming notes may be transacted; and provides for the retention in this division of a reserve fund equal to 25 per cent of the amount, both of United States notes and Treasury notes, issued under the act of July 14, 1890, outstanding, for the purpose of redeeming greenbacks and Treasury notes when presented.

Section 4 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of maintaining said reserve fund, to sell bonds of the United States and to exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States if at any time he deems it necessary in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States.

These four sections establish the gold standard in law. The leading commercial nations of the world have adopted gold as their standard of value. It is in very truth "the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth." The law which we are about to enact does not establish a new policy for the United States, but it is intended to settle any doubt which may exist.

The purpose of the committee, which purpose is carried out by the bill reported, is that the United States shall by deliberate action take its place with those countries which have clearly and unequivocally adopted the gold standard by law. Sections 5 and 6 of the bill provide for the coinage of subsidiary silver coin, the recoinage of worn and uncurrent coins, and repeal the law which limits the aggregate amount of subsidiary silver coin and of fractional currency outstanding at any time to $50,000,000. The provisions are made because the everyday transactions of business have shown the necessity for a greater amount of small change. The report of the committee calls attention to the fact that so great has been the demand for small change that the law has been necessarily disregarded, and that the issue has so increased that on September 30, 1899, the total amount was $76,523,333.

Section 7 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue or reissue United States notes or Treasury notes in denominations not less than $1, and makes provision that silver certificates in denominations only of $1, $2, and $5 shall hereafter be issued and paid out. This authority is demanded by the urgent need of money in small denominations. Section 8 amends section 5159 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so that national banks will be allowed circulation to the par value of the bonds deposited for their security. The amendment has been recommended by four Presidents and five Secretaries of the Treasury and is demanded by business conditions. The reason for limiting the note issue to 90 per cent of the bonds no longer exists. At the time such a law was enacted Government bonds were selling below par.

Section 9 repeals the tax upon circulation and places it upon the franchise of the national bank based on its capital, surplus, and undivided profits. This is not a reduction of the tax, but an equalization. In fact, the money received by the Government will be a little more than formerly. The tax upon circulation bore with special severity upon banks outside of our large cities. To meet the needs of our smaller communities, their banks were obliged to issue circulation, while banks in larger cities, on account of their great deposits, have not been under that necessity and so have escaped taxation. The last section of the bill (section 10) is also drawn in the interest of our small communities. It permits the organization of banks of $25,000 capital in places the population of which does not exceed 2,000 inhabitants. Banking accommodations are greatly needed in the sparsely settled districts of the West and South, and this provision is expected to meet that need.

As has been said, this bill is very far from furnishing a complete scheme of finance, but it is a very decided step in the right direction. So far as it goes it is satisfactory. More than any other piece of legislation which we are likely to pass during the present session of Congress will it contribute to the material well-being of the country. More than 90 per cent of our commerce is with gold-standard countries. This bill removes, for the present, at least, the danger that the United States may become a silver monometallic country like Mexico. It will be a tremendous factor in causing our present prosperity to be an enduring prosperity. It proves again that the Republican party is the party of progress—that it is the zealous guardian of the national honor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. PRITCHARD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 8) construing the act approved June 27, 1890, entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," reported it without amendment.

REVISION OF THE PENSION LAWS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on the 25th of February, 1899, during the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, the following resolution was passed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions is hereby authorized and directed, by a subcommittee appointed for that purpose, to carefully examine, during the recess of Congress, all general laws on the statute book granting pensions to soldiers, their survivors and dependents, and to pursue such other inquiries in connection with the matter of pension legislation as may be deemed advisable; report to be made to the Senate, by bill or otherwise, at as early a day as practicable after the assembling of the Fifty-sixth Congress, the expense incurred to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The Committee on Pensions, through a subcommittee, have discharged the duties devolved upon them under that resolution, and I am directed to present the report. In doing this, however, I propose to read, for the information of the Senate and of the country, the report the committee have made, of course not including the testimony and other documents that are annexed. I beg that during this reading, which will not occupy many minutes, I may have the attention of the Senate.

"Pursuant to that resolution, the chairman of the committee visited Washington twice during the summer months and made careful examination of all laws bearing on the subject of pensions, with a view of determining what changes, if any, should be made in the existing statutes. He discussed the matter with the officials of the Bureau of Pensions and carefully noted their views. It was evident that, while the laws are broad and generous, much difficulty has arisen in their administration because of the obscure phraseology of some of their provisions, and the necessity for certain amendments was apparent. Subsequently, to wit, on the 29th day of November, a subcommittee of the Committee on Pensions, as provided in the resolution, consisting of Senators GALLINGER and HANSBROUGH, met in the city of Washington and took statements from the Secretary of the Interior, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Pensions, the First Deputy Commissioner of Pensions, and Col. George H. Patrick, representing the Grand Army of the Republic. These statements, which will be found exceedingly interesting and instructive, are printed in connection with this report.

"The officials who were interrogated all advocated the creation of a nonpartisan commission to revise and codify the pension laws with a view to making them more uniform and intelligible, thus rendering their administration less difficult and free from existing perplexities. It was also agreed on all hands that the wishes of the Grand Army of the Republic to give a pensionable status to widows under the act of June 27, 1890, who are in possession of an annual income not exceeding $250, in addition to the proceeds of daily labor, and that in estimating the pensionable status of soldiers under that act minor disabilities shall be aggregated should be complied with and the act amended accordingly. In the matter of aggregating minor disabilities the Commissioner of Pensions assured your committee that that is the practice of the Bureau of Pensions at the present time, so that there can be no valid objection to enacting it into law.

"The Commissioner of Pensions called the attention of the committee to his recommendation on page 21 of his last annual report, from which it appears that while pensions to soldiers commence from the date of filing the claim, pensions to widows date from the death of the husband. The law as to widows was changed in the appropriation act of June 27, 1888, which act removed all limitations as to the date of filing claims. The Commissioner recommends that that provision of the act of June 27, 1888, be repealed, in which recommendation your committee cordially concurs. The attention of your committee was also called to the fact that under existing law minors' pensions are being paid to people who have reached mature age, some of whom have been married and reared families. In these cases the minor did not apply for pension during the years of minority, but in after life, probably prompted by the ever-diligent pension attorney, application is made and in some instances pension has been granted. A large number of such cases are now held up in the Bureau pending a decision of the honorable Secretary of the Interior as to the pensionable status of such claimants. Your committee is constrained to believe that the law should be so amended that if a minor fails to make application before the age of 16 is reached, such claims should lapse.

"Your committee were instructed to report by bill or otherwise, and accordingly bills will be presented for the creation of a commission on revision and codification of the pension laws, for the amendment of the act of June 27, 1890, as urged by the representatives of the Grand Army, concurred in by the officials of the Interior Department, and, so far as the provision relating to widows is concerned, recommended by the President in his annual message to the Fifty-sixth Congress, and for the repeal of the act of June 27, 1888, relating to the time when widows' pensions shall commence. Later on other bills may be presented designed to correct inequalities and inconsistencies in the laws.

"Following the statements made to your committee there will be printed as an appendix amendments proposed by the Grand Army of the Republic to sections 2 and 3 of the act of June 27, 1890, the report of the national committee on pensions of the Grand Army of the Republic, and a synopsis of all laws enacted since the foundation of the Government on the subject of pensions.

"In conclusion your committee desire to emphasize their belief that a commission of learned jurists, one of whom shall be a representative and member of the Grand Army of the Republic, should be created without delay, to take into careful consideration the entire pension system, in the hope that they may present a revision and codification that will free the statutes from ambiguities and uncertainties, and construct a code that can be administered to the satisfaction of both the beneficiaries and the Government. Believing that to be practicable, your committee will press the bill for the creation of a commission to early consideration."

Mr. President, I present this report, and as there will doubtless be a large demand for the document from various sections of the country, I ask that 1,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator present also a bill accompanying the report?

Mr. GALLINGER. I present three bills in connection with the report.

The bills were read twice by their titles, and placed on the Calendar, as follows:

A bill (S. 1476) creating a commission to revise and codify the pension laws of the United States;

A bill (S. 1477) in amendment of sections 2 and 3 of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," approved June 27, 1890; and

A bill (S. 1478) to repeal so much of the act of June 7, 1838, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, as relates to the commencement of pension to widows under the acts of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1873.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for printing 1,000 additional copies of the report for the use of the Committee on Pensions. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: In presenting a report a few moments ago from the Committee on Pensions, I asked that 1,000 additional copies might be printed for the use of the committee. Several Senators have suggested to me that it is a document which will be called for very freely from all over the country and that the number ought to be at least 2,000. I therefore now ask unanimous consent that 2,000 additional copies be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That refers to the report which the Senator made this morning?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that of the report made by him this morning 2,000 additional copies may be printed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

EXPENSES OF VICE-PRESIDENT'S FUNERAL.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. GALLINGER on the 11th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by direction of the President pro tempore in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, Garret A. Hobart, at Paterson, N. J., on the 25th of November, 1890, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Resolved, That there be printed and bound in cloth 2,500 copies of the Annual Report of the Librarian of Congress, 1899, 500 for the use of the Senate and 2,000 for the use of the Librarian of Congress.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved. CENTENNIAL OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the following Select Committee on the Establishment of the Seat of Government in Washington, as provided for by the resolution passed last night.

The Clerk read as follows:

Select Committee on the Establishment of the Seat of Government in Washington: Mr. J. G. CANNON of Illinois, Mr. WILLIAM W. GROUT of Vermont, Mr. JOEL P. HEATWOLE of Minnesota, Mr. JAMES S. SHERMAN of New York, Mr. JAMES A. HENNEWAY of Indiana, Mr. ROBERT J. GAMBLE of South Dakota, Mr. J. W. BAILEY of Texas, Mr. MARION DE VRIES of California, Mr. WILLIAM S. COWHERD of Missouri, and Mr. JOHN C. BELL of Colorado.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXIV, the following joint resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

Joint resolution (S. R. 28) relating to the use of the rooms lately occupied by the Congressional Library in the Capitol—to the Committee on Rules.

Joint resolution (S. R. 26) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the use of the United States post-office and courthouse building at Parkersburg, W. Va., by the circuit court and criminal court of Wood County, W. Va., sitting at Parkersburg—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the special order the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill H. R. 1. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, the bankers and bondholders of the world are now winning the greatest financial victory that ever has been achieved in the legislative arena of the world.

When Mr. Spalding drew his greenback bill in 1861 and gave it to the press, the Bankers' Association of the country sent to Washington a committee of nine of its members, who drew and pressed an interest-bearing bond substitute before the Secretary of the Treasury and the committees of Congress, but finally failed except in the compromise they obtained in placing the exception clause in the greenback, which enabled them to make untold millions out of it. From that day to this they have annually declared for the retirement of the greenback and for interest-bearing bonds, and for a quarter of a century for the gold standard, and now they are getting all any ordinary avarice could covet.

Sirs, if there had never been a national-bank note or an interest-bearing bond, there never would have been a silver question in the United States, as there never has been a just cause for such a question.

I do not wonder that our Republican friends are tired of the indictment of 1873. The records of this and of the other Chamber and the confessions of their own great leaders establish it as one of the "most mysterious and diabolical crimes of the century."

The deception and infamy concealed in this bill may divert the attention of the people for a season from the original crime, but as long as the people read the records of that transaction no bluff or denial will cause the defrauded public to forget or forgive the turpitude involved.

The arguments of the advocates of this bill are made entirely from the point of view of the bondholder and banker, which is just the reverse of that of the economic thinkers or the masters in monetary science.

Mr. Robert Barclay, in his work on Disturbance in the Standard of Value, says:

Monetary science is something different both from finance and from banking, and we know that the full study of it is as much shirked, both by merchants and bankers, as by other classes.

The banker does not study or master Government financing, but is an adept in so handling private funds as to make the largest possible profits with the least possible expenditure of treasure and of human effort.

The banker's property is in money, bonds, and mortgages.

The scarcer wheat is in the market, the higher the price to the farmer. The scarcer workmen are, the higher the wages. The smaller the money supply, the more promiscuous property and necessities of life will the dollar buy. Therefore, the money that serves the banker and bondholder best is least desirable to the Government, and that which serves the Government best is never most beneficial to the money-changing class.

The founders of our Government recognizing this doctrine, understood that no one dealing in national-bank stock or currency could occupy the position of Secretary of the Treasury.

When Hugh McCulloch was appointed from the banking circles it somewhat astonished the public, but from that day to this the bankers have generally dictated the policy of the Treasury Department.

The present Secretary of the Treasury, as good a banker and citizen as he may be, (and he must have been a good banker, because he has long managed one of the greatest national banks on the continent and been the president of the National Bankers' Association), can not be expected to be an ideal Secretary of the Treasury, because his duties here directly conflict with his interests and duties as a banker, and his teachings of a lifetime favor bank rather than national money. The handling of the bonds of the nation has been worth many millions to the banks of the country, and the Secretary's bank must have been a great beneficiary of his acts as an officer of the Government. It is expecting too much of him to expect him to be oblivious to the banking interests. As conclusive evidence that it was never intended that a national banker should control the Treasury Department, the national-bank act prohibits the Comptroller of the Currency or his deputy from being connected with any national bank, and they are under the direct control of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Their bonds are approved by him, and it would be preposterous to say that it is against public policy for the smaller officers to be interested in a national bank and that the larger one, in control, might reap such harvest as these banks have reaped under this and the last Administration where they never sowed.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] adopts the pretended banker's theory that "legal tender adds no value to money." This is not only contrary to all authors on government money, but utterly in conflict with common sense. As well might he say that you could destroy all electrical and steam power without increasing the value of the horse.

Mr. Muhleman, deputy United States Treasurer, in his splendid book entitled Monetary Systems of the World, opens his first paragraph with the sentence—

Perhaps the most important attribute of any form of money is its legal-tender power; that is, the power conferred by law to discharge a debt payable in money.

And this is the assertion of all men versed in monetary science. But the banker whose bank paper is not legal tender and those to whom he furnishes arguments must be expected to conflict with the disinterested monetary scientists.

The value of money is the salable or exchange value, and is governed by the law of supply and demand.

And so says every author writing upon monetary science. The value of money, its salable or money value, is governed by the law of supply and demand just the same as wheat or any other commodity is governed by the law of supply and demand. But few intelligent writers on this question ever refer to such a thing as intrinsic value, because it is becoming an obsolete term as applied to the value of money. You might as well talk about the intrinsic value of the air or the sunshine as to talk about the intrinsic value of gold and silver. Its value is chiefly as a money metal, but it has a salable or usable value for other purposes, but the great part of its value is occasioned by the world's demand for monetary purposes.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] also unfortunately dropped into the sophistical argument that prior to our present silver dollar we only had 8,000,000 silver dollars in the United States, and that by the act of 1834 we demonetized silver.

It is unfortunate that the gentleman at the supposed head of a great committee with a bill like this should descend to such an argument. These are not only misleading statements, but the latter is not based on a fact. It was the mere afterthought of Senator Sherman, who was floundering in the boiling indignation of the people for his part in the clandestine demonetization of silver, twenty years after it occurred, and he, like another traditional gentleman, pointed his finger at Andrew Jackson and says he committed the crime of 1834, and the bankers of the country took that up and said silver was demonetized in 1834.

No man had ever learned of it in Europe or America until silver was demonetized in 1873, or ever thought of such a thing for many years afterwards. Does not the gentleman from Indiana know that prior to the civil war we had practically no commerce, no railroads, no rich men in the nation, and that our transactions were small; that we had the most of our silver coined in pieces less than a dollar and that full legal-tender qualities were by law given to the Spanish milled dollar and to the dollar of all foreign nations, and that while we only had about 8,000,000 of silver dollars we had over 150,000,000 of full legal-tender silver circulating in our channels of trade up to the time of the demonetization of foreign coin?

Does not the gentleman realize that under the beneficent influence of the present silver dollar we developed our commerce, manufactures, transportation, and does he not know that in our changes in the value of the silver dollar that we were simply trying to make it correspond to the ratio of other countries, with no idea of any reference to the supposed intrinsic value of the two metals? England was doing the same thing. Every country in the world was trying to make the ratio correspond to the then French ratio of 15½ to 1 by adjusting their transportation charges to the different ratios.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] says that the divergence between the two metals caused the demonetization of silver. That is utterly fallacious. Everyone familiar with American finance knows full well that when silver was dropped from our coinage laws it stood at the ratio of 15½ to 1; that the people neither had knowledge of nor desire for demonetization. It is also well known that by reason of the mints of France being open at 15½ to 1, this fixed the price in every part of the world at 15½ to 1, less transportation to the French mint.

For eighty years, however much the production of gold might increase over the production of silver, or the production of silver over that of gold, the relative value of the two metals never materially changed. Not only this, but during the eighty years that the French mints were open to the world at 15½ to 1, causing the people of the United States and other countries with a ratio of 16 to 1 to move their silver to the French mint in bars, it proved no particular detriment to the nation exporting her silver, as she received gold or its equivalent in exchange for it or paid its foreign exchange in bar silver instead of in coined metal; and you do the same thing to-day if you send your coined gold to London. It is not taken as coin; it is weighed as bullion without detriment to the home government, and while the gold and silver were held at parity by reason of this open mint it had the same effect on commerce and prices as though the whole stock of gold and silver had been gold or had been silver alone, as the two metals conjointly measured the values of the world and conveniently made the exchange of the world.

Some seem to be alarmed at the increase of the gold production. However, this is incomparable to the scare of Europe when the great discovery of Australia and California caused the demonetization of gold in the German governments. When the Comstock was at the height of its silver production the European experts warned their governments to abandon silver, as these mines would soon be producing 500,000,000 ounces per year. These alarms were without foundation, as the present will prove.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] dropped into the further money changers' argument that we have too many silver dollars, and says we could not circulate them, while the facts are that in the panic of 1893 there were standing premiums posted in New York for silver dollars, and they could not be had; and there has been a scarcity recently, and as quiet as the gentlemen are upon this subject the Government is constantly coining the silver bullion in the Treasury at the rate of $1,500,000 per month.

Ah, but, says the gentleman, the people will not use the silver dollar when they have any connection with it at all they use only the silver certificate. The banker's argument again. I ask my friend, the representative of the gold standard, if anybody in this country or any other country uses gold except through the gold certificate?

It is the rarest thing to find a gold piece or a silver dollar in circulation in the Eastern and Northern States, but you find the gold and the silver certificate freely circulating side by side.

The advocates of this measure glowingly console themselves in their general stultification in going from the bimetallic to the gold standard, because they say that the recent prosperous times have exploded all old theories.

The very reverse is true. By reason of the unprecedented crops in this country and a great shortage abroad, and by reason of the unexampled strides of the American people in the production and export of iron, steel, petroleum, and machinery, our balance of trade has been such, when taken with our domestic output of gold and the large coinage of the silver bullion in the Treasury, together with the wars, starting all the machine shops and gun and ship factories of the country, and taking up all of the idle men, either for work or for soldiers, that things have necessarily been reasonably prosperous, and the supply of money has been so abundant that it has raised the general prices, confirming beyond question our cardinal theory that every increase in the ratio of money to property or of working capital to labor increases the prices of property or labor, and every decrease in the ratio of money to property or labor decreases the price of property or labor under the unvarying law of supply and demand.

There really never has been a good-faith battle of the standards. The leading bankers and money changers never have cared any more for gold than for silver.

It has always been a question of bank paper and interest-bearing bonds, with as little Government money as possible, on their side.

Gold has never been sacred to the bimetalists, neither has silver, except that they have always believed that from their durability, their homogeneity, divisibility, portability, and comparative stability in values, they are the best materials from which to coin money, and as the two conjointly never have been produced in sufficient volume to furnish the money supply of the world, but from time immemorial supplementary paper money in large volumes has been necessary, therefore we insist that this paper currency should be a national currency instead of bank paper.

TRUSTS.

But, sirs, what benefit we should have had out of rising prices has been largely neutralized by the great syndicates and trusts so raising their prices that it absorbs the advantages of the people not having their products protected by a trust.

The Bowling Green Democrat has just gone through its markets and exposes the leopardlike prosperity appearing there.

It finds that October 13, 1898, wheat was worth 62 cents per bushel; October 13, 1899, wheat was worth 64 cents per bushel.

October 13, 1898, corn was worth 38 cents per hundredweight, and October 13, 1899, it was worth 28 cents per hundredweight.

October 13, 1898, 3-inch iron pipe was worth 5½ cents per foot, and October 13, 1899, it was worth 15 cents per foot, or nearly three times as much.

Nails on October 13, 1898, were worth $1.65 per hundred pounds, and on October 13, 1899, they were worth $3.40 per hundred, or more than twice as much.

Wire fencing, plain, in 1898, was worth $1.85 per hundred, and in 1899 it was worth $4 per hundred, or more than double.

On October 13, 1898, for 2½ bushels of wheat a farmer could buy 100 pounds of nails; on October 13, 1899, it took 5½ bushels, or about twice as much, to buy them.

On October 13, 1898, the farmer could buy 100 pounds of plain fence wire for 3 bushels of wheat, and on October 13, 1899, it took 6 bushels, or just twice as much.

Tin plate two years ago was worth $2.25 per box, to-day $5.30 per box.

Now, sirs, that is your trust prosperity, which robs the poor and further fills the coffers of the rich.

It is this blessed system for which so many of you so proudly stand sponsor.

Sirs, there are some curious things transpiring in this trust agitation as well as in this financial controversy.

For a generation the Republican party has persisted in acclaiming that it was the genuine friend and advocate of bimetalism, and secured all branches of the Government under this plea, then hurries its cohorts to the gold Democracy, the only party that has ever conducted a national campaign on the gold standard.

Senator THURSTON, the chairman of the last Republican national convention, which nominated President McKinley, said recently, in addressing the Republican clubs in Baltimore:

Capital in every form, alarmed by the threatened disaster and danger of free and unlimited coinage at the forced ratio of 16 to 1 by this nation alone, rushed to the support of the Republican party, and it happened thereby that the financial jugglers and manipulators and great trusts and combined, that had always been with and of the Democratic party, were forced into the Republican party.

Notwithstanding this support, the President, in his recent message, with great political diplomacy, ingeniously referred to the decision of the Supreme Court upholding the Sherman anti-trust law and gave color to an inference that he favored curbing the trusts.

His personal and official defender on this floor, General GROSVENOR, has hurried to the same pedestal and acclaimed that he could think of nothing that could be added to this great Republican measure.

These things are significant from the fact that the stock operators of New York have been floundering in chaos and falling prices, giving as a reason the message of the President and anti-trust decision.

This is significant, because for a quarter of a century this same class has been feigning to disturb values and wreck prices when any legislation was enacted or was threatened in the interest of more liberal financial legislation for the American people, and are now conquering the people in the securing of this measure, and the same tactics and results may be expected with the other trusts.

If one could not read the handwriting of the trained politician between the lines, he might be convinced that the President intended to "out-Bryan Bryan" on the antitrust agitation, as he did for a quarter of a century on bimetallicism; but the trail of the golden serpent, indelibly embedded in his whole silver record, will be a burning warning to the often-deceived American voters. They must see that this bill will become the incubator of an untold number of money syndicates to oppress and further burden a patient and confiding people. And his action on other trusts will be the same as on this money trust.

Now, sirs, I construe the diplomatic utterances of the President in his message and the position assumed by his ever-ready representative here, General GROSVENOR, that the law is now sufficient, in their opinion, and that this Congress is to make no good-faith effort to further control the trusts. Enough has been done and enough has been said upon which to mislead the voter without hunting the trusts. It is hardly possible that the President and his party can be everything to all men on this question, as they have been on the silver question, without the deception being exposed.

STANDARD OF VALUE.

The first section of this bill makes the dollar consisting of 23.21 grains of pure gold the unit of value and gold the standard.

Adopting a standard of value, from the importance of money, is always a great responsibility, but establishing a new standard where many debts exist, created and payable under the old standard, is doubly important. No just standard can be devised for existing debts which permits the creditors to collect more than they lent or permits the debtor to pay less in value than he received. Such a standard must always be based upon full legal-tender money, and must be so fixed that in deferred payments or long-time loans the value paid will be equal always to that received.

BIMETALLIC STANDARD.

The present legal standard of this nation is bimetallic, or based on both gold and silver, and $18,000,000,000 of debts have been contracted under the bimetallic standard and $1,300,000,000 of United States obligations are now outstanding made payable specifically in coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870, the time when the act was passed which embraced the present silver dollar as well as gold coin. The correctness of this version is proved not only by the decisions of the Attorney-General, but by the declaration of the Matthews resolution, which passed both Houses of Congress with great unanimity in 1877.

PAYMENT OF DEBTS IN GOLD.

The second section of this bill provides—

That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money now existing or hereafter to be entered into * * * shall be deemed and held to be payable in gold coin.

What does the payment of these debts in gold which were contracted to be paid in gold and silver mean to the creditors of this nation?

It means that after a struggle of over a quarter of a century the money changers and speculators have secured such a change of the money standard as to give them hundreds of millions of dollars in value more than they really lent.

Sirs, this is not a matter of wild speculation; it is demonstrated through the actual offers of speculation for our bonds payable in coin or in gold alone. On February 8, 1895, President Cleveland sold $62,315,435 thirty-year coin bonds to August Belmont & Co., N. M. Rothschild & Sons, J. P. Morgan & Co., and J. S. Morgan & Co., and obtained an offer at the same time that if he would have Congress provide that they should be payable specifically in gold coin that they would reduce the annual interest payment $539,159, a saving in thirty years of $16,174,770.

President Cleveland upon this day in a special message to Congress said:

The arrangement just completed * * * develops such a difference in the estimation of investors between bonds made payable in coin and those specifically made payable in gold in favor of the latter, as represented by three-fourths of a cent in annual interest. In the agreement just concluded the annual saving in interest to the Government, if 3 per cent gold bonds should be substituted for 4 per cent coin bonds under the privilege reserved, would be $539,159, amounting in thirty years, or at the maturity of the coin bonds, to $16,174,770.

And this sum was offered the Government to make them payable in gold alone. Now, the same men who made this advanced bid for bonds made specifically payable in gold hold largely our other coin bonds. If it was worth to them over one-half a million dollars a year to have $62,000,000 made specifically payable in gold instead of in coin, then it was worth just as much in proportion to have the $1,300,000,000 outstanding coin bonds made payable specifically in gold; or the market value of the annual interest on the $1,300,000,000 coin bonds, if converted into gold bonds, would be enhanced in value over $9,000,000 per annum.

Now, sirs, there is no dodging the question. When this bill is passed, there is taken from the pockets of the people $9,000,000 per annum by Congressional legislation and without consideration, except love and affection, and which will be thrown into the opulent laps of the bondholders and national bankers of the country.

The legislation of money from the pockets of the taxpayers into the pockets of the syndicates now controlling legislation has become so common and so enormous that it is appalling.

The audacity of this move would be astonishing if Congress had not succeeded in the last few months in voting untold millions into the hands of these syndicates without arousing much public indignation.

Do you not think that the national-bank and bond syndicates have received enough through the vile popular loan scheme wherein there was voted them $200,000,000 bonds at par, when they were worth in the market at least from 105 to 100, or $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 more on the market than face value? And they were voted to them as a gift under the false pretense that they were to go to the poor people of this country, as though they had a right to vote anyone these millions, whether rich or poor. Everyone knows now, and they should have known then, that it was the speculators' scheme to have the eleven or twelve millions of the people's money voted into the pockets of the syndicates. The whole thing was so gauzy and cheap that a great many banks condemned it as a damnable theft. The banks used their customers to subscribe for the bonds, but the banks paid for them and owned them at all times. On the 9th of this month these bonds were worth on the market 109½, or $19,500,000 above par, a gift voted into the pockets of the purchasers.

The Speaker of this House, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. CANNON, Mr. HOPKINS, Mr. HEPBURN, and many other leading Republicans refused to vote to put "gold" in this issue, though we could save more than $16,000,000 thereby, because, as said by Mr. HOPKINS, the precedent would cost us a hundred million. However, now these same men are supporting this bill, with its gift of a hundred million, under the pressure of a party caucus and a party pressure.

One of the most essential attributes of a monetary system is to establish a stable standard of value, so that in case of deferred payments and long-time loans the creditor can not collect more than he lent or the debtor pay less than he received.

This standard must be based on full legal-tender money.

While a bank currency forms a good circulating medium when times are normal and confidence is unshaken, however it is credit money and it must be paid or redeemed in gold.

It has been the experience of the financial world that as the standard of value contracts and as confidence is disturbed, instead of bank paper or other redeemable or credit money expanding it contracts in sympathy with the money in which it is to be redeemed as a standard and as a means of storing values.

Because gold has been scarcer, it has generally been used for large payments and for storing great values; and silver, because more abundant, has been generally used for divisional coins and small payments and as a means of storing smaller values, and the two conjointly make an ideal currency for the masses of the people.

If this bill passes, the eighty-nine million Treasury notes, the three hundred and forty-six million greenbacks, and four hundred and eighty-two million silver dollars will circulate among the people or will be impounded as the whims of the dictatorship of some great banker at the head of our Treasury may direct.

The traditional ideas of this class are for scarce and dear money and cheap property, which is a synonym for misery and hard times. These things which so annoyed President Cleveland, lengthens even the endless chain system of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, owing to the limited time which has been allotted for the purpose of debating this measure, I had at first thought that I would content myself with recording my vote against it; but when I consider its vital and far-reaching effect upon both the present and future welfare of this country, I deem it a solemn duty which every gentleman on this side of the House owes to the constituency which sent him here to raise his voice against its passage and denounce as unjust and criminal this scheme of plunder and bondage.

Some knowledge of the present financial condition of the people of this Government is possessed by every member upon this floor, and despite the oft-repeated statement and wild cry of prosperity that continues almost hourly to go up from some self-constituted patriot on the other side, the cold fact still remains that we are to-day overwhelmed with both public and private debts. And to the consideration of these let us for a moment devote our attention.

When the present outstanding interest-bearing indebtedness of the Government shall become due and payable, as it will in the next few years, it will require in round numbers something near one billion five hundred million dollars to pay it. To this public debt must be added the vast bonded debt of cities, towns, and improvement districts, together with that of railroad transportation and other industrial corporations. And to this must still be added the more than six billions of mortgage indebtedness, as shown by our own statistics to exist upon our homes and farms. I doubt if twenty billion dollars, more than five times as much gold as is in circulation in the entire world, would be more than sufficient to pay off and discharge this public and private indebtedness. Let it be remembered that when a majority of these obligations were assumed and contracts made it was with the distinct understanding and agreement that they could be paid in the legal-tender money of this Government, either gold, silver, or paper currency; such was the law and such the contract, and so it should remain. No debtor should be required to pay otherwise, and no honest creditor should demand it.

By the terms of the second section of this bill, "all obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established and payable in gold alone." Thus by an act of Congress it is proposed to not only establish the odious gold standard, but to go further and do what no court in the land would ever dare to do, violate the most sacred obligations of more than a million contracts by depriving the debtor not only of the means of payment, but by making him pay in a different and dearer money! If there were no other reasons, this one gross act of merciless injustice ought to be sufficient to consign this bill to defeat and oblivion.

There are others of no less importance. In section 4 of this bill the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell interest-bearing bonds, redeemable in gold alone, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to make the sale for the purpose of the maintenance of the reserve fund. Here the unparalleled and extraordinary power is given to one man to increase the interest-bearing bonded public debt whenever in his judgment it is necessary to do so! When before has Congress ever been asked to make a grant of any such power?

When you increase the public debt, a corresponding increase must be made in the heavy burden which is placed upon every industry and taxpayer in the land and will be bequeathed to our posterity. More than 70,000,000 people should rise up and protest against this attempted outrage. For myself, I am opposed to bonds and bond issues. I do not believe that in times of peace even Congress itself should have the power to increase the public debt, much less the granting of such a right to a single individual. But this is not all. By the same section the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, at his discretion, to exchange gold for any other money issued or coined by the United States. And when so redeemed or exchanged said money shall be held in and constitute a part of the redemption fund. To get the gold for this purpose resort is again had to the sale of interest-bearing bonds; and at his discretion the Secretary may here add another increase to the public debt of more than a billion dollars. One can scarcely realize that such a grant of power would ever be thought of, much less tolerated. And yet the majority of this House are determined that it shall be made.

The only reason assigned so far for the consummation of this crime is that conditions have changed since the last election. I admit they have, and would remind you that they have changed in more ways than one. Let it be remembered that in the Congressional elections of 1898 you went before the country claiming that your party was then engaged in the prosecution of a most successful war. You begged and pleaded to be not repudiated, but that a Congress should be sent here that would be in harmony with the Administration and would sustain the President. In addition to this, the enormous sums of money which had just been spent by the Government in the preparation for and the prosecution of the war had increased the circulating medium and enabled you to make a show of returning prosperity.

Still, under these circumstances, your majority is reduced from more than 50 to less than 15 in the present House. Never but once before has any political party suffered such reverses under like conditions, and that was under Mr. Tyler's Administration in 1846. The one great cause which, in my opinion, largely produced this great change was the fear entertained by the people that the infamous Gage bill, or some similar measure, would be enacted, fixing the gold standard upon the country and giving to the banks the control of the currency. I can see but one good result that will follow your action: It will transfer the majority in the Fifty-seventh Congress to this side of the House, and in your places put good and true Democrats.

Some idea of the great advantages that will accrue to the bondholder can be gained by giving attention to the sale made by Mr.

Cleveland in 1895 of $62,000,000 of bonds. The purchasers of those bonds offered to give a bonus of $16,000,000 to have them made payable in gold instead of coin. If at that time they could afford to pay $16,000,000 to have the word "gold" written in $62,000,000 of bonds, then you are, by passing this bill, making them an absolute gift of more than $250,000,000, when you make the whole governmental debt payable in gold, which now amounts to more than a billion dollars, as I have stated.

Hence, we see from whence comes the demand for this bill. And who is it that is clamoring for its passage? No party platform has ever declared for such a measure, nor has it ever been submitted to the people for ratification by their votes, and its advocates know full well that they dare not submit it, for the delay would mean its certain defeat.

The scheme is by no means new or untried. It has been the dream of more than a lifetime. It means untold millions and unlimited power to the national banks and the bondholders, and they see in its passage the consummation of long-deferred hopes. When it is passed (as it will be) and receives the signature of the President, it will become their deed, signed, sealed, and delivered to this Government. Their ownership, their power and control will soon become absolute. What they lost by the veto of the funding bill by President Hayes they have now more than gained with compound interest. They have gained the control of the entire currency of the country, and can fix the price of every product and commodity offered on the market. Every man with reasonable intelligence now knows that the prices of commodities are fixed and regulated by the currency in circulation. So when any men or set of men possess the power to expand or contract the circulating medium of the country they thereby necessarily have it in their power to raise or lower prices to suit themselves, and the people are helpless to protest against it. That this is true, Mr. Chairman, has been fully proven and demonstrated within the past few days and since this bill has been pending. The banks have caused a panic in the cities of New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and others, as will be seen from the following dispatch published in one of the leading papers of the city, which I now read as a part of my remarks:

ALMOST A PANIC IN STOCKS—BALTIMORE SECURITIES THROWN UPON THE MARKET AT ANY PRICE—GILT-EDGE HOLDINGS SUFFERED WITH THE REST, AND TRUST COMPANY GROUP WAS CONTINUALLY RAIDED—BANKS REFUSED AID AND CALLED IN ALL LOANS.

BALTIMORE, MD., December 6, 1899.

This was the most exciting day on the local stock exchange since last spring, though the movement was unlike the one then, in that prices declined instead of advanced. The market seemed to be honeycombed with selling orders. Stock after stock was raided, and important losses were scored throughout the list, many shares making new low-priced records.

No attention was paid to values. Gilt-edged securities were thrown upon the market and sold regardless of the prices they brought. The holders appeared to be panic-stricken.

The trust company group was the center of interest. The selling was heaviest and the losses most severe in that group, though the liquidation was not confined to that quarter.

Even bonds went down in the slump, and large blocks were thrown on the market without regard to price.

Mercantile Trust, Continental Trust, Guardian Trust, Fidelity and Deposit, Maryland Casualty, International, Old Line Real Estate, and American Bonding were severely depressed, declines ranging from 1 to 9 points. Consolidated Gas broke 14 to 51. United Railways issues were also notably weak, the income bonds breaking to 70 after selling at 74 in the initial dealings.

There was some support to the market in the final dealings, though it was not sufficiently large to stem the downward movement, which was in full progress when the market closed.

Nearly every stock sold went from 10 to 50 points below its book value. Heavy dividend payers like the Fidelity and Deposit, Maryland Trust, and Mercantile Trust went by the board at ruinous prices.

Absolutely no protection was given the market. United Brewery 6 per cent bonds, which are regarded as among the safest investments, sold at 85.

The brokers assign as a cause for the slump the action of the banks in calling in all loans and refusing to render any further assistance in carrying the securities.

Thus it will be seen that the banks now can precipitate a panic at their pleasure under the law as it now is. And they can do so with much greater ease after the passage of the present bill. The overshadowing danger that lurks beneath every legislative enactment which increases the power of monopoly, and especially the money monopoly, has been seen and recognized by wise and thinking men for many years past. Senator Windom, a Republican, and who a short time afterwards was made Secretary of the Treasury by President Garfield, on the 21st day of February, 1881, wrote to the Anti-Monopoly League of New York this letter:

I repeat to-day in substance words uttered seven years ago—that there are in this country four men who in the matter of taxation possess and frequently exercise powers which neither Congress nor any of our State legislatures would dare to exert—powers which, if exercised in Great Britain, would shake the throne to its very foundation. These may at any time, and for reasons satisfactory to themselves, by a stroke of the pen reduce the value of property in the United States by hundreds of millions. They may at their own will and pleasure disarrange and embarrass business, depress a city or locality and build another, enrich one individual and ruin his competitors and, when complaint is made, coolly reply, "What are you going to do?"

What was true then will be true now, even in a more potent sense. Delegate this power, and you will find it will be followed by financial depression, panics, bankruptcy, and ruin. The losses in honest trade and the misery and want to honest labor will merit and elicit our just complaint, but the reply will only be, "What are we going to do about it?"

While on this line there is one other matter that I desire to speak of before I bring my remarks to a close.

During the Fifty-fifth Congress the same majority who are giving such ardent support to the present bill passed over our objections and earnest protests a bill which they said would protect the American manufacturer and at the same time raise a revenue for the Government. As a revenue-raising measure it was soon made quite clear that it was a failure, but as a protector to the manufacturer and monopolist it was a most dazzling success. Never before in any like period of our history did trusts, combinations, and monopolies spring into existence and being as fast as they have since the passage of the Dingley tariff act, until now you can name no kind of goods, wares, or merchandise that is not controlled by the trusts. Prices have been advanced on all the necessities of life by these same combinations from 25 to 150 per cent, while thousands of men have been thrown out of employment and made dependent.

The unjust and unnatural advance in all commodities has aroused the just indignation of the American people, and they are being heard from in every State, and it is to be observed in the wonderfully reduced Republican majority in the Fifty-sixth Congress. But there are some amusing things connected with it. While the chairman of the Republican national committee, Mr. HANNA, boldly defends trusts and combinations upon the stump and declares them to be a blessing, and while the Attorney-General appointed by the President composedly informs the country that he is powerless to enforce the statutes and laws of the United States already passed against them and that the State governments must do what the United States can not do, President McKinley, in his recent message to this Congress, makes this most remarkable statement:

Combinations of capital organized into trusts to control the conditions of trade among our citizens, to stifle competition, limit production, and determine the prices of products used and consumed by the people, are justly provoking public discussion, and should early claim the attention of the Congress.

It is to be regretted, Mr. Chairman, that the President did not find time to insert into this voluminous and peculiarly worded message some suggestions to Congress as to what he thought should be done by them in this important matter of trusts.

It is also a matter of regret that some of our great public men do not see these gigantic evils until it is entirely too late.

But we are now about to pass this measure, that will legalize and create one of the most stupendous, dangerous, and powerful trusts that has ever been formed—that is, the money trust. It has no equal, and will never have. It will enslave and pauperize its millions. It will spread its dark wings of ruin over this fair land like a blighting and withering curse, and yet it has the indorsement of the President of the United States!

If it must be done, and there is no way to avert it, then I suppose you are right in your hasty action, for the sooner we are over with the agony the better. My people will at least have their undaunted courage and bravery left them, and will continue to fight the great battle of life as best they can, and breathe the ennobling spirit of these beautiful lines:

So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, how long am I recognized for?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in the academic discussion of finance which has been going on here for the last day or so sight has been lost of the provisions of this bill. Members of the House know how this measure found its way here, but I doubt if there is one man in a hundred outside this Chamber who understands fully what the Republican party did and is doing to fasten the wrongful and ruinous provisions of this measure on our statutes. Those of us who served through the Fifty-fifth Congress know that the Committee on Banking and Currency was so constituted it either would not or could not make a report or present a bill, although the last Presidential election was fought on the subject of finance. It was claimed by the Democrats, and I think rightly, that the then Speaker of this House purposely organized the Banking and Currency Committee so it would never report, hoping in that way to shirk its party's promises made to the Gold-bug Democrats in 1896.

Upon the adjournment of the last session of Congress a Republican caucus named certain gentlemen to prepare a bill to reform the currency. This measure is the product of their labor. It was framed by no authority of this House. It was prepared when Congress was not in session, and the committee of Republicans who framed it held their meetings behind closed doors at Atlantic City, the most fashionable watering place on the Atlantic coast. Gentlemen may claim the meetings were held at Atlantic City because they were laboring during the summer and they sought a cool retreat, but this will not do. An examination of the membership constituting that caucus committee discloses that a majority come from the Northwest. A more pleasant as well as quieter spot could have been found nearer their homes. If the meeting place at Atlantic City was selected by accident, it was, to take the most charitable view, unfortunate. It is there that many of the most dangerously rich of New York and other places of this country spend their summers. There the committee would be most subject to and most easily reached by the sinister influences which we believe antagonistic to the great body of the American people.

Mr. Chairman, it was certainly the greatest man Missouri ever produced, and I believe one of the greatest America ever produced, who warned the American people against the influence of what he termed the "better element" in our politics. I am not of those who wish to taboo the potentiality of bankers, chambers of commerce, and rich men in shaping our financial and fiscal policy, but I think the artisan, laborer, and farmer should be as often consulted and as generously followed. There is not a member of this House who for three years has not received armfuls of papers, pamphlets, and letters from bankers, sound-money leagues, and other gold-standard associations urging the adoption of the single gold standard and the granting of greater privileges to the national banks, but I challenge any gentleman on either side of this Chamber to exhibit a half dozen letters from laborers or farmers asking for the passage of such a law. I have never received one.

In the campaign of 1896 the Democrats contended that as money increased in volume prices advanced and as it decreased values fell. This was denied by gentlemen on the other side. They claimed it was the quality and not quantity of money that fixed prices; but, sir, the position of the Democratic party has been vindicated by almost every gentleman favoring this bill. It is now admitted, even by the authors of this measure, that the increase in the output of gold during the year 1899 is the immediate cause of the advance in prices, and one gentleman [Mr. DOLLIVER] frankly admits this measure could not have been passed a year ago, or even now, unless the gold supply had increased. So, sir, we find the Republican party admitting that whatever there is of prosperity existing in this country is traceable to an increase of our circulating medium, establishing, as I think, the truth of our contention in the last Presidential campaign. The Democratic party is not hostile to gold. We care nothing for the color of our basic money, whether it be yellow or white; but what we want is a sufficient supply of money upon which to do the business of the country and to place beyond the control or influence of money sharks the product of labor, genius, and toil.

The total amount of gold produced in the United States during last year was $64,463,000, and of this sum $13,585,879 was used in the arts, leaving a little over $50,000,000 to be added to our stock of money, less than $1 per capita. Advocates of this bill point to the world's output of gold—$287,428,600—during the last year as evidence of the fact that there is plenty of gold. Over one-fourth of the gold produced went into the arts, and the world's supply of money gold during the last year only amounted to $215,000,000, in round numbers, less than $3 per capita if every dollar of gold produced in the world had been coined in this country.

Money is a commodity regulated by supply and demand as completely as wheat, corn, or tobacco; and while no man will deny that a great crop of corn or wheat makes the article cheap and a short crop makes them dear, the single-standard man, by logic I can not understand, for reasons utterly unsatisfactory, says, Destroy money and it will be plentiful; increase its supply and you will have none of it.

Sir, if the condition of the American people was as prosperous as the Republicans claim (and I deny there is any general prosperity) and should continue for months, it would not refute our position, because prosperity based on an increase in the supply of gold but proves our contention. If I felt sure enough gold would be mined in the next few years to supply the needs of the people I should not so seriously object to this bill, but I can not persuade myself to believe such a thing probable, or even possible. Mr. Chairman, there are millions of our people who believe the passage of such a measure as this little short of a national crime; and in view of this fact, as well as the further fact that our money is now as good as it is possible to make it, why pass a bill opposed by so many and whose friends claim will not alter existing conditions?

There are provisions in this bill wholly unjustifiable. We have no right to give to any set of men the power to contract or impound our currency—over $700,000,000—at will; and yet that is exactly what is done. There is in our currency, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $355,000,000 of greenbacks or Treasury notes. This bill provides that when greenbacks reach the Treasury they shall be held and not reissued except for gold. Now, if the great banks of this country wish to contract our currency they can gather up the greenbacks and demand gold from the Treasury on them. This ties up the greenbacks, and it will then remain only to lock up the gold paid out for the greenbacks and $700,000,000 have retired from circulation. In addition, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed by the third section of this bill to impound or hold—the amount of United States notes held against currency certificates, the amount of silver dollars held against outstanding silver certificates, the amount in silver dollars and silver bullion held against outstanding Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890.

This provision ties up and retires over half the money of this country. How can a citizen, whatever his opinion on the subject of finance, vote for such a bill?

But, sir, not content with establishing the gold standard and with delivering the last blow at silver as money, the authors of this infamous measure absolutely invade the domain of private contract and forbid the citizens of this country to make any contract for the payment of money except in gold. It even goes further than that, and says contracts now entered into for the payment of money shall be discharged in gold. Yes, even though the contract says payment shall be made in silver or bank notes or greenbacks. A more drastic or oppressive measure was never considered by this body.

But, sir, I have yet to mention the most extraordinary, as it is the most infamous, provision of this bill. In the fourth section, defining the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury, this language is used:

He is hereby authorized to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of said reserve (gold) fund, bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate of not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable in gold coin, at the option of the United States, after one year.

What other country in the world would give such power to one man, and he not even responsible to the people whose destiny he controls. The right to sell bonds on the credit and faith of the people of this country without limit and without being responsible to any person for his acts is so enormously dangerous it seems incredible a representative of the American people would countenance such a suggestion. The bonded debt of this country now amounts to the great sum of $1,046,048,750, and of this enormous total $500,000,000 has been added since 1892, and $300,000,000 was added by Secretaries of the Treasury, as I think, without a line of law or shred of authority for doing so. The balance, $200,000,000, was added by the provision of the bill passed in 1898 and known as the war-revenue bill. The interest on this public debt exceeds $40,000,000 a year.

Our debt is well-nigh as great as it was in 1870, when we had just passed through a most disastrous and protracted civil war, and, sir, the most distressing feature of the matter is, it is constantly increasing. The power to issue bonds for some one else to pay is too dangerous to intrust to any one man. The reason and purpose for conferring such unlimited and dangerous power on one man may be plainly seen by reading the subsequent sections of the bill. It proceeds to create a national-bank trust of the latest and most approved pattern, and whatever rights the people had remaining over their money after they were through with the Secretary of the Treasury it turns over to the banks. The Democratic party is not hostile to banks, but it is unalterably opposed to banks of issue. We believe the right to coin, issue, or make money is the highest prerogative of sovereignty and should never be dislodged from the source of all power—the people. This bill grants to the national banks a demand they have sought for twenty years—the right to issue money to the par value of bonds held by the bank.

I have briefly stated the worst features of the bill; it contains many if not all the objectionable features embraced in the bills advocated by the gold-standard press and champions in recent years. Instead of taking the Government out of the banking business, a thing the Republicans claimed they wished to do, it forms a permanent partnership between the United States and money changers. I would perhaps be going too far to say national bankers are the enemy of the Republic, but in the light of history and experience I am justified in characterizing them as not its friend. The most persuasive argument is an appeal to our selfishness and to contend that enlarged powers to banks is in the interest of the people is against both the judgment and experience of mankind. Had it not been for the iron patriotism of Jackson, seconded as he was by the great Benton, once before in our history a national bank would have had us by the throat; as it was, to break its hold and crush its power gave a shock to our Government second only to civil war.

Sir, when Napoleon's sword was red with the blood of every people, when England alone, gasping for breath, remained free and almost single-handed staked its existence on the destruction of the most powerful as he was the most dreadful despot of the ages, the governors of the Bank of England calmly informed the younger Pitt that no more gold would be furnished to carry on the war, and the salvation of the Empire was insured only by the issue of paper money. This bill practically eliminates all kinds of money but gold and national-bank notes, and both are controlled by national banks. Should the prediction of the Republicans be realized and $280,000,000 of gold produced in the last twelve months grow to $500,000,000 annual product; should the Rand and Yukon prove as rich as is claimed, the sincere advocates of this bill are destined to grievous disappointment. It is dear money, not gold money, the monometallist seeks.

In 1847 Australia began to furnish gold; in 1849, California. The output became so great the money kings of Europe became alarmed and sent to this country a committee to investigate the possible extent of the gold deposit. A report from that committee that gold existed in great quantities so alarmed the very rich that Germany, Portugal, and Holland in 1853 demonetized gold and established silver as the only metal fit for use as money, and the same argument was then made against gold that is now used against silver. Sir, I shall welcome the day that brings so much gold into the world it can not be cornered or controlled by a few, and every believer in the free coinage of silver would learn with delight that Alaska and South Africa were producing a billion of gold each year. Since this discussion commenced $17,000,000 of gold has been shipped from New York to London, and more is leaving every day. The Bank of England has raised the price of exchange until gold can be shipped from this country at a profit, and the money sharks, hastening to take advantage of it, are sending hundreds of thousands of gold by every ship. Berlin, in fact all Germany, is suffering for want of gold, and in our own country the Secretary of the Treasury is depositing money by the millions in various banks daily in order to prevent a panic, and yet gentlemen calmly go on pressing a bill that contracts our money supply and forever destroys the legal-tender quality of all our money except the gold. The passage of this bill does not settle the question. The American people are yet to be heard from.

The Democratic party can not be suspected of selfish motives in taking the position it occupies. We realize to the full ours is a dangerous way, for every powerful money institution, not only of this country but the world, is against us. Every selfish interest, every entrenched wrong, every special privilege is fighting us. We are fighting a desperate contest. Beginning with Great Britain in 1816, every country of continental Europe has struck colors to the money devil, and, although our people have fought long and hard, we at last are about to go over to him. But, sir, I have an abiding faith in the wisdom and justice of my countrymen. Our retreat is not a surrender. The people will again resume their own. If I looked only for party advantage, I could ask nothing better than the passage of this bill, for I verily believe it will return to "plague its inventors" before another summer is past; but the want and wretchedness it will entail, the unhappiness it will bring to the millions of working people, arouse emotions far more serious and, I trust, nobler than mere partisan advantage.

The establishment of the gold standard will do no harm to the rich; it will make their pathway easier; but, sir, we are not here to legislate for the rich, but for all the people. One circumstance that may well arouse the suspicions of ordinary people is that the provisions of this bill have been advocated by bankers and gold-standard champions for twenty years. These people are manifestly seeking legislation beneficial to themselves, and if their pet measure was alike beneficial to all, no advantage would accrue from its enactment. No one but the philanthropist would press legislation equally advantageous to all but not changing the relative position of men as now existing. The pamphlets, the arguments, resolutions, and speeches constantly emanating from sources deeply interested in large money institutions mean something, and that something is those institutions expect an advantage over other people by the establishment of the gold standard. No country ever had too much metallic money, and the authors of this bill warn us of dangers to be feared not experienced from bimetalism.

In 1884 there was $917,884,668 of paper money of all kinds in circulation; in 1899 this amount had only increased $73,000,000, and of the total amount of paper money in circulation in 1899, $184,000,000 was issued in bills of $500 and upward to $10,000 and of course never circulated among the people. In 1890 the so-called Sherman law was passed, and the Secretary of the Treasury commenced to buy silver bullion and issued certificates against it. Our total stock of paper money in 1890 was $1,004,886,724, and in 1899 $1,144,250,891. Of this sum, $406,085,504 is secured by silver held in the Treasury and $237,832,504 by bonds deposited by national banks, leaving a little over one-half to be secured by the faith and credit of the Government, as well as by the gold held in the Treasury. Each dollar of both the metallic and paper money is good and received by all our people for all debts, so there is absolutely no justifiable excuse for cutting from under our paper circulation the legal-tender silver that now aids in supporting it.

I wish again, sir, to say something about the bond feature of this measure. I can not conceive how gentlemen will explain an affirmative vote to their constituents. What legal right have we to change the terms of a contract made thirty years ago? You propose to make all of the bonds of this Government payable in gold. Not one of them says so in the bond itself. Who is benefited by such a law? I have not the exact figures at hand, but know that 4,500 banks of the United States hold a large per cent of the bonds. Now, what is it you do? "First," you say to the banker, "buy bonds and you will get interest on the bond, and, moreover, you may issue and loan money to the full face or par value of the bond; second, we will change the contract so as to make your bond payable in gold, although the bond says coin (silver or gold); third, we will destroy silver as money and double the value of your bond and also the money they are to be paid in." Sir, who can justify such conduct? During Cleveland's last term he informed Congress if it would authorize him to insert the word gold in a $62,000,000 bond issue, he would make for the people $16,000,000, but his proposition was at once rejected, and you now propose to do for nothing that which even Cleveland admitted was worth $16,000,000. But, sir, it seems idle to take up further time in discussing this matter. Men's minds are fixed, and anything short of an actual trial will change no one.

In advocating the free and unlimited coinage of silver the Democratic party seeks advantage of no man. Our fundamental tenet is equality before the law for every citizen of the Republic. We have learned, from bitter experience, the difference between a splendid and a happy people. The accumulation of great fortunes is menacing to the spirit of democracy. The policy of the Republican party has well-nigh stifled competition in many vocations, and the gravest problem before the American people is how to prevent the trusts from engulfing our commercial life. The practical destruction of $355,000,000 of greenbacks and the utter annihilation of silver as money builds up, by operation of law, a bank trust that will dominate the very existence of the people. There should always be enough money in circulation (I mean debt-paying legal-tender money) to enable the farmer to market his crop without mortgaging it for the manufacturer to sell the product of his mill without hypothecating it to some bank for money to operate upon. A few men in New York or London can produce a panic in this country whenever it suits their purpose. This is not even denied by gentlemen on the other side, but they say the output of gold is increasing so rapidly there will soon be enough to supply the world with sufficient money. But is it not better to wait until that time comes before acting?

From 1847 to 1855 the increase in the output of gold was relatively as great as now, but we have not even yet a sufficiency. It requires, Mr. Chairman, far more statesmanship to foresee an evil and provide a preventive than it does to suggest a remedy for an existing and apparent one. The Republicans, taking advantage of a slight increase in the supply of gold, are gathering lessons from the hour which overturn the experience and judgment of years and centuries. If the gold standard will discriminate against labor, if it will aid the creditor and oppress the debtor, if it will depress the products of man's toil and raise the value of money, then the bill should never pass; but you will pass it. You have the power and will use it; your promise made to every selfish interest in 1896 must be redeemed. I am opposed to the principle and every section of the bill. I stand by the declaration of my party and declare nothing short of the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 of silver to 1 of gold will ever settle this question with the people.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to tell me that I had twenty minutes. I will ask the gentleman how long he understood that I was recognized for?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood for fifteen minutes. If I had more time, I would give it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am not complaining, but I did not understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this measure with satisfaction because of the first fourteen lines and notwithstanding practically all that follows.

If there had been any possibility of this bill becoming a law as it now stands, I should have offered at the proper time as a substitute the following:

A bill to determine the standard of value, to fix the measure or unit of value, and to establish the parity of all legal-tender money.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the standard of value shall continue to be gold, and the measure or unit of value shall be, as now, the gold dollar, which shall contain 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine or 23.22 grains of fine gold.

SEC. 2. That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States now existing or hereafter entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be, and hereby are, made redeemable in the gold coin of the United States; and when any of said notes shall have been redeemed in gold coin they shall not be paid out again or exchanged except for gold coin.

SEC. 3. That all the legal-tender money of the United States shall, at the option of the holder thereof, be, and is hereby, made interchangeable at the subtreasury of the United States in New York City, and at such other places as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time designate.

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of meeting the requirements of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall set aside and maintain in gold coin or gold coin and gold bullion a reserve fund of $150,000,000; and he is hereby authorized and required, whenever necessary to maintain said fund, to issue and sell bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum and payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable at the option of the Government at any time after the expiration of one year.

SEC. 5. That all national-bank notes shall, at the option of the holder thereof, be redeemed in gold coin; and that the fund deposited by the national banks in the Treasury of the United States for the redemption of their notes shall, from and after the passage of this act, be in gold coin.

SEC. 6. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal-tender quality of the United States notes, Treasury notes, the silver dollar, or of the subsidiary or minor coins, or the law making national-bank notes receivable and payable for certain public debts and dues and obligations between national banks.

For more than sixty years our standard of value has been gold, in actual practice, and to the Democratic party we are indebted for that wise and beneficent selection. Since then the entire civilized world, with a single exception or two, has reached the same conclusion, though at times they, like ourselves, have suffered and paid the frightful cost of change, of hesitation, and of doubt even.

We no longer mention the countries which have adopted the gold standard, but invariably say all have adopted it except Mexico and a few half-civilized and some heathen nations. The benefits of an unequivocal standard, and that the standard of the civilized world, are being reaped in every line of employment and production and in every nook and corner of this great Republic. Never in the history of any nation has there been such a contrast in the same length of time as the years of 1896 and 1899 disclose. This miraculous, indeed almost incomprehensible, change is very largely due to the verdict of the people in 1896.

What was that verdict? It was against the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio 16 to 1, and was written in these words:

We, the people of the United States, do find that all our silver and paper currency must be maintained at a parity with gold, and we favor all measures designed to maintain inviolably the obligations of the United States and all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard, the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth.

Does the measure before the House carry that verdict into execution beyond the peradventure of a doubt? I do not believe that it does. Let us see. On page 4, beginning in line 9, we find these unfortunate, these fatal words:

If at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary, in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, he may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States.

While in an earlier part of this same section he is commanded to redeem United States notes and Treasury notes in gold coin, he is in this subsequent clause remanded to his discretion whether he will exchange gold coin for the same United States notes and Treasury notes, leaving his position precisely where it is to-day. The section, no doubt, taken altogether, would authorize and impel a conscience and discretion leaning toward the gold standard to maintain the parity of all our moneys. But what about a conscience and a discretion that are hostile to the gold standard and wedded in fact by all political associations to silver and, as he may choose to term it, the bimetallic standard?

I am deeply impressed with the fact that the American people are tired of doubts, tired of interrogation points, tired of political straddles, and are looking wistfully for a law so clear and unequivocal that every intelligent citizen can understand it; a law that can not be construed to suit the conscience or discretion of any Secretary of the Treasury; a law that needs no judicial interpretation; a law that is the undoubted echo of the people's verdict in 1896.

The verdict of the people was that "all our silver and paper currency (silver as well as paper) must (not may, at the discretion of a bimetallic Secretary of the Treasury) be maintained at a parity with gold." With that injunction upon us, can we at this session of Congress do anything less than make our silver and paper interchangeable with gold?

Can any man who cares for his reputation as a candid and honest thinker attempt to explain to an American audience why he made a United States note which is worth in and of itself only the value of the paper upon which it is printed, and the Treasury note which is secured with about 80 cents' worth of silver bullion, redeemable in gold coin, while he made no provision for the current redemption of a silver dollar which is worth only 40 cents; unless, forsooth, the silverized fancy of a bimetallic Secretary of the Treasury happened, perchance, to suggest such a thing as the redemption of a silver dollar in gold coin as a wise exercise of his discretion? If we can take them at their word, their discretion will never work in that direction, for they have already said, from Candidate Bryan and Populist Allen down, that the only policy for the Government to pursue was to simply refuse to pay gold and pay out silver and the parity would thereby be maintained; in fact, that that very act would be the maintenance of the parity.

It would seem, therefore, that this act was specially drawn for just that kind of an experiment. Indeed, one of the best thinkers of this House declared that silver would go to a discount immediately if this measure should become a law as it now stands. He forgot, however, for the moment, that the Republican party was in power, but I fear he spoke with prophetic vision if the latter-day Democratic party should by any mischance come into power and be given the opportunity of exercising a silverized discretion.

The bill before the House provides, on page 1, line 14, that all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section, referring to section 1, which means gold payment or its equivalents. From the statement of facts already set forth it is clear, to me at least, that since silver is a legal tender the Government might be compelling its citizens to take silver dollars which were below par, while they in turn would be compelled to pay their creditors gold or its equivalent, thereby losing the difference, which would range anywhere from 1 to 60 cents on each dollar of their obligations.

This Government can not afford to ask or demand a higher degree of honesty on the part of its citizens than it proposes to practice itself. Therefore, why do we attempt, through the legerdemain of words, to escape the responsibility of being absolutely honest with regard to our silver as well as our paper obligations? In his New York speech the President well said more than a year ago:

It will not suffice for citizens nowadays to say simply that they are in favor of sound money. That is not enough. The people's purpose must be given the vitality of public law.

When this is done and all the legal-tender money of the United States is made interchangeable, no legislation will be necessary with regard to contracts, public or private.

Again, on page 4, line 10, we find these words:

Except as hereinbefore in this section provided.

What is the inevitable effect of this clause? Simply this: To leave the Government just where it is to-day with regard to the United States notes and Treasury notes. The endless chain is perpetuated, and the net result can only be to insert a swivel or two to lessen the friction, extract gold as usual, and contract the currency of the country.

I for one have thoroughly misunderstood the American people or else they desire to break the endless chain of demand obligations and set the endless chain of gold coin in motion.

The President, referring to this very subject in his message, said:

Let us remove the only remaining cause by conferring the full and necessary power on the Secretary of the Treasury and impose upon him the duty [not give him the discretion] to uphold the present gold standard and preserve the coins of the two metals on a parity with each other, which is the repeatedly declared policy of the United States.

In this connection I repeat my former recommendations that a portion of the gold holding shall be placed in a trust fund, from which greenbacks shall be redeemed upon presentation, but, when once redeemed, shall not thereafter be paid out except for gold.

No member of this House, including the committee itself which prepared this measure, will contend that the United States notes and the Treasury notes which may have been redeemed in gold coin can not again be put into circulation in the ordinary course of business and without the deposit of an equal amount of gold coin.

The American people are opposed to a continuation of this dangerous and destructive policy, and have so declared themselves. Let our courage prove a fit counterpart to their honesty and intelligence.

Again, it is not a matter of discretion whether a man shall be honest in the payment of his debts. Nor is it a matter of discretion whether a bank or other commercial company or municipal corporation or State shall be honest in the discharge of their respective obligations.

What is true of the man, the bank, the business company, the city, the county, and the State is equally true of this Government. And if there could be such a thing as comparative honesty in the payment of a debt, the nation should stand as the ideal.

Some of the silver dollars now in circulation were worth 100 cents when coined, and for all of them—now approximating 500,000,000 in circulation, or represented in circulation by silver certificates—the Government has received full consideration for the face value; therefore, whatever depreciation the silver dollars have undergone is a loss of the Government, and should be sustained by it and not by the individual who may happen to have silver dollars in his possession. The citizen who holds a silver dollar has commercial value of 40 cents and a claim against the United States Government for 60 cents, and the dollar itself is the evidence of it and a proper check for the balance due. So long as the Government keeps that dollar as good as gold the people will continue to use it freely as a fit tool with which to accomplish their commercial work. Therefore, let the Government frankly, honestly, bravely, boldly admit that the loss on the silver dollar is its own loss, and that its citizens shall not be called upon to bear any portion of it under any circumstances, however adverse, even under a Democratic Administration.

Let not this Government assume that there can be any discretion about paying an honest debt. Much less let it gamble upon the political chance of giving that discretion to a silverized bimetallic politician who has declared that he would exercise that discretion to the discredit and everlasting dishonor of this great nation. Let us, before this session closes, make all the legal-tender money of this Government interchangeable, remove the last possible doubt, eliminate the remotest chance, and eternally settle the question beyond the power of any man or party, unless the people shall thereafter will it, of which there will be or can be no possible chance until the world moves simultaneously to some other standard; for the American people are honest, they are the most intelligent and potent nation in the world, and are superlatively brave if their public servants will but blaze the way.

Mr. Chairman, I could have hoped that the committee had accurately defined the scope of its work in these words, taken from its report:

The committee did not consider the general subject of banking, nor did it seek to arrange a complete scheme of finance, but confined its recommendations to those subjects of most pressing demand, as evidenced by the pledges of the Republican party and the general policy of the Republican Administration.

In withholding recommendations relative to the general subjects of banking, bank currency, and the control and general supervision of banks, and also the question of the retirement of the greenbacks, the committee does not want to be understood as having considered such subjects at all nor as passing judgment upon them, but rather to have left the same to the usual channel of consideration through the proper committees of Congress.

The committee was of the opinion that the most urgent subject was the question of a monetary standard and provision for its maintenance. The strengthening of the public credit by the removal of all doubt concerning the policy and practice of the Government relative to the unit of value is of paramount importance. To effect this result by a complete guaranty of the quality and parity of all our money, without any disturbance by change in the quantity or kind, was the chief purpose of the committee.

It is evident from these words that the committee has proposed many things in its excursions into the fields of coinage and currency whose full effect they did not contemplate, and therefore I shall refrain from making any observations upon the other subjects covered by this bill, hoping that at the proper time and place they will be wisely adjusted or omitted for the present to await more deliberate consideration.

Had I said less upon this occasion I should have been recreant to my duty, to my country, my State, and my constituency; and, what is more and more important still to me, untrue to my convictions and unworthy of myself.

I shall vote for this bill, because it is an upward and onward step in the right direction, and because I have absolute confidence that the measure which shall go into the statute books will have the clear and unequivocal ring of a gold coin and will not be marred by marks of indirection, evasion, subterfuge, or paraphrase, suggesting even remotely the possibility of doubt or the faintest recollection of bimetalism; that the measure will be worthy of the great impending problem, worthy of the glorious history of the Republican party, and worthy of the honesty, intelligence, and courage of the American people. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

THE CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] is recognized for thirty-five minutes.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this debate, particularly to that on the Democratic side of the House, with great interest. I was amazed at the utterances of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], who aspired to the leadership of that side of the Chamber, when he assured us that in the campaign of 1896 McKinley and the Republican party won because members of the Democratic party had either been intimidated or had sold out. That was an astonishing utterance coming from a leader upon that side of the House.

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. BERRY. Does the gentleman think the Republican party could have won without the aid of the recreant Democrats who voted for the gold standard?

Mr. LACEY. That is another proposition. The gentlemen to whom my friend refers as the "recreant Democrats" who voted for the gold standard neither sold themselves nor were they scared. From the other side were drawn the votes unquestionably that won in that election, and a more honorable body of men never stood up to be counted than the Gold Democrats of 1896. Six and a half million votes were cast for William J. Bryan and for the experiment of free silver. Seven million votes were cast for sound money, protection, and prosperity, and the Gold Democrats who cast their lot with us have had their reward.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly. I will hear now from another one of these leaders.

Mr. SULZER. Were those 7,000,000 votes all of them cast for the single gold standard?

Mr. LACEY. They were cast for the declaration for gold in our platform, and the controversy among Republicans to-day is as to who had the honor of writing the word "gold" in the St. Louis platform. The newspapers are full of that discussion. I see across the aisle to-day an increase in the Democratic membership over the last Congress. Where does it come from? It comes from New York, from Massachusetts, and from men who have secured their election by trampling under foot the Democratic platform of 1896.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. That is not so in New Jersey. We will not stand by that in New Jersey. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. Perhaps not in New Jersey. New Jersey was for a long time out of the Union, but in the last Congress they were unanimously for the Republican cause.

Mr. SULZER. How about Nebraska?

Mr. LACEY. Nebraska! The most pitiable thing in all history is for Nebraska to stand up and be laughed at by Kansas. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The Republican party, like all other such organizations, is a party of promises; unlike many of such organizations, it is also a party of performance.

Its position upon the great question of our national standard of value is well known. Favorable to the upbuilding and fostering of American industries as it has always been, it has attempted, while maintaining the parity of all our money, to "do something for silver."

It has resisted all the attempts that have been made under the name of "bimetallism" to place the country upon the Asiatic and Mexican silver standard. In seeking an "international agreement" it has in good faith attempted to aid the silver producer in securing a wider range of uses for his product. But all these attempts have been in vain. The commercial nations of the earth have accepted the logic of events and have determined to use silver in a subsidiary form and maintain it, when coined, at the standard of gold. The concession that gold is sixteen times more valuable than silver is an admission that there is a proportionate value which must be taken into consideration.

The only actual silver question grows out of the commercial variations in that ratio.

Experience has taught us, as it has taught other nations, that we can only maintain both metals in actual circulation by coining the cheaper one on Government account and redeeming it, either directly or indirectly, or exchanging it on demand for gold. It remains as good as gold only as long as it can be converted into gold.

The silver question has been so fully discussed that it seems idle now to go into details. The country has become thoroughly tired of it.

In the Fifty-fifth Congress the House of Representatives could readily have passed a bill of the general import of that now under consideration. All the bills presented involved numerous matters of detail, and it was perfectly evident at the time that no bill on the subject could pass the then free-silver Senate. Members of this House were averse to taking up and studying the details of a measure that it was obvious could never become a law. The Spanish war intervened, with all its exciting episodes, and there was enough for that Congress to do without attempting the impossible, and the question of settling the standard by law was relegated to the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The settlement of the question by law in the Fifty-fifth Congress was also rendered the more difficult by persistent attempts to couple with it radical, experimental banking legislation. The "gold Democrats" of 1896 abandoned Mr. Bryan and his Chicago platform, and, while supporting General Palmer, they, with great unanimity, voted for "McKinley and prosperity."

These men were anxious in the last Congress that permanent law should take the place of the present plan of maintaining the parity of our money by executive action. It is now declared by law that all our money shall be kept equal, and with a gold-standard President and Secretary of the Treasury the law has been found fully adequate to that end.

With parties divided as they are now, and under existing law, the election of a free-silver President could place this country on the silver standard in thirty days and shipwreck every business interest in the country during the readjustment following the declaration of the people in favor of the change in the standard of value. If our party were to view this subject from a purely selfish standpoint it would be better for it if the question were left open and the country should be compelled to choose between Republicanism and the gold standard and Democracy and the fluctuating standard of silver.

On this question, with the experience of the last four years before their eyes, the people would choose, as they did in 1896, to "open the mills instead of the mints." Viewed from the standpoint of party selfishness, it might be well to leave the statute as it now is—the subject of Presidential good faith. A sound-money President is absolutely essential as the law now stands. Mr. Bryan and his followers stand pledged to redeem the Governmental obligations in the cheapest money that will fill the letter of the contract. They broke permanently with Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Carlisle because the Administration refused to take the chances of redeeming our promises in silver.

On this issue the country has declared in favor of the policy of the Republican party. It is the duty of that party to redeem its pledges, as the Treasury redeems its promises, in the full measure of its party platform. The party platform of our party in 1898 in the State of Iowa, upon which the Speaker of this House and the other members of its unanimous delegation were chosen, speaks clearly the views of the majority of the people of Iowa.

I will read it:

IOWA PLATFORM, 1898.

That the experience of the past two years has fully approved the gold standard policy of the Republican party as declared by the national convention of 1896. We recognize the necessity of comprehensive and enlightened monetary legislation. The monetary standard of this country and the commercial world is gold. The permanence of this standard must be assured by Congressional legislation, giving to it the validity and vitality of public law. All other money must be kept at a parity with gold. Our money, like our institutions, should be maintained equal to the best in the world. In this plank we invite the support of all voters who desire honesty and stability in business affairs and an immediate and permanent settlement of the question of the standard of value.

There is the declaration of the Republicans of the State of Iowa, and sound-money Democrats cast their votes in favor of that proposition. Iowa emphasized its position again in 1899, and a majority of nearly 60,000 were recorded upon the side of the gold standard and of sound money.

The other day I had a letter from one of the sound-money Democrats of Iowa. Said he:

It is reported that the Republicans will not redeem their pledges given to the Democratic sound-money, gold-standard men, because under the present law it is necessary to elect a Republican President in order to maintain the pledges of parity.

I answered him:

DEAR SIR: Your letter is at hand. On next Monday, at 12 o'clock, Washington time, we intend to pass the gold-standard bill; and it will be just 11 o'clock Iowa time. Look out for it.

And we intend to redeem that pledge, my friends, notwithstanding it relieves you from some of the dangers of the campaign of 1900, and may enable you to go to the country and say: "Elect Bryan; he can not do any harm." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Republican party is passing this measure so hastily because they apprehend that Bryan will be elected because he is in accordance with the sentiment of the American people, and they are going to put it beyond their power to undo the harm that will have been done?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman's statement is so full of misunderstanding that he does not do credit to the speech which he has just made. I say, sir, that we are about to put in the form of statute law the standard that is now upheld by good faith on the part of the Executive of this country. Mr. Cleveland maintained the gold standard; so has Mr. McKinley.

The Republican party promised to give you this kind of legislation, and propose to carry it out, whatever the consequences to the party may be. Now, the gentleman to my left, the distinguished leader from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], told us also that we were having "prosperity in spots." Is there any gentleman on the other side of the Chamber now that will rise—I will yield him time to do so—and tell us that he represents "a spot" not now prosperous? [A pause.] Where is there one of those barren spots of the Republic? I asked my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] on yesterday, and he seemed to rejoice that Tennessee was having pretty good times, without free silver and under the Dingley law.

We must not forget, my friends, what took place just a few short years ago by the very threat that our standard of value was to be changed and the existence of a silver basis was proposed. You seem to forget the Cockey army that encamped under the shadows of this Capitol and that were "kept off the grass" by the police just a few years ago. I visited that body of Bryanites when they came to this city. I went with a number of Congressmen. We asked one of them, an intelligent-looking man, what they wanted. He said, "What we want is more money." I asked, "How do you expect to get it?" "Print it." "How are you going to put it in circulation?" "Build roads and canals with it." "Well," said I, "how much do you intend to issue?" "Five hundred million dollars." "You mean to put the stamp of the Government on it?" "Yes." "How are you going to redeem that money?" And he looked at me with a pitying smile, and said, "Redeem her? Never! Just print her, and let her go." [Laughter.]

The people if called upon to recruit a Coxe army or a Kelly navy now would reply: "Too busy! Too busy!"

Experience has proved that the doctrine of sound money and honest recognition of national debts is the best economy. The nation which pays to the uttermost farthing is sure of good credit and a low rate of interest.

The same country where, under threat of the silver standard, the whole world demanded immediate payment of all obligations, national, corporate, and individual, finds itself at this time with sound credit and a surplus in the Treasury.

Good money is the surest foundation for a healthy national financial condition, whilst depreciated money is like blood poison in the system.

In 1892 our opponents denounced protection as a "policy which fostered no industry but that of the sheriff."

In 1893 the sheriff increased his force of deputies, for he was the only busy man in the nation except the free-silver soothsayers. The people voted a want of confidence in the Republican party in 1892. The old augurs of the Democracy prophesied and saw visions, and their young men dreamed dreams and talked and talked, but business men refused to invest, and the goddess of confidence deserted our shores until she was recalled by the decree of the people in 1896. Those were the longest four years in our history.

Out of the old fields of protection and good money comes the new corn of prosperity.

You will remember the great cartoon of McKinley "opening the mills instead of the mints," and of the title bestowed upon him by my colleague [Mr. DOLLIVER] of "the advance agent of prosperity."

The mills have been opened, labor is employed, wages advanced; every promise has been performed and every pledge redeemed. Now let us write in the statutes of the country with the force and effect of permanent law the good faith of our party to the American people, who have so greatly trusted us.

The people of America expect much and demand much from the Republican party. They do not expect impossibilities. We declined in the Fifty-fifth Congress to attempt impossible legislation upon this subject. In the present Congress the situation is very different. We are now in a position of power, coupled with corresponding responsibility in both branches of the legislative body and at the White House. We are now in a position to perform our agreements. The time for talk has passed by, and the hour for action has arrived.

A legislative milestone should now be erected to mark the progress of national thought.

This bill will serve that purpose. With its provisions upon the statute books, any President must obey the law until it is repealed, and no mere Executive order could then overturn the standard of commercial value.

The sound-money Democrats, who aided us by their votes and influence in 1896 and 1898, will see by our action that the party with which they have been temporarily associated is worthy of their permanent support.

In 1900 the attempt to overthrow the legislative settlement of this question will be resented by every business interest in the United States, and labor will insist on keeping good the standard of wages, too. One more contest must be fought out upon this issue.

With our position fortified by the enactment of law, the attempt of our opponents to overturn existing conditions will be displeasing alike to the wage-earner, the farmer, and the business man.

Even after the lapse of so short a time as has passed since 1896 it is hard to recall the desperate conditions that surrounded our people at that time. Under the threat of free silver, and under the actual existence of the Wilson-Bryan law, business was paralyzed and the free-silver orators were demonstrating that cheap money was the only cure for the financial ailment of the nation.

Thousands of workmen who had been thrown out of employment by the Wilson-Bryan law and by the attack upon our monetary standard rallied around Mr. Bryan and, deceived by his plausible words, skipped over twenty-three years of time and charged the existing calamity to something that the Republican party had done in 1873. Napoleon's maxim for success was, "Audacity! Audacity!!"

The cool audacity of the Populist-Democratic fusion of 1896 swept thousands of lifelong Republicans off their feet, but the campaign of education that followed brought the business interests of the country into line, and the workmen took their second thought, and the victory of 1896 came, followed by its gratifying results.

It would seem that in the light of past events the silver question ought not to be fought over again. But our opponents require plenty of time to catch up with the procession. Mr. Bryan and most of his supporters now eulogize Lincoln. Even a good word for Garfield and Blaine may occasionally be heard from them, but all this takes time. Usually their greatest difficulty is found in fully comprehending the death of an issue.

That splendid old Democrat, Andrew Jackson, fought the battle of New Orleans on January 8, 1815. His victory was of the type that has made Dewey famous in modern times and Joshua in ancient days. Twenty-six hundred of Jackson's enemies bit the dust, and only 13 Americans were killed and wounded. It was, indeed, a notable deed, one that did honor to the American arms, and we all join in sounding the praise of Old Hickory.

But you will recall that this battle was fought before the days of Atlantic cables, and the treaty of peace was signed at Ghent fifteen days before the fight, and the slaughter was, indeed, an unnecessary one. That was in the old days, when sailing ships, with their woven wings, slowly carried the message of peace across the deep. The gallant Jackson got so much and such well-deserved glory out of this victory that the party that now claims to represent his principles emulates his example and continues to fight its battles after the war is over, when all questions in dispute ought to be forever set at rest.

Merritt and Dewey stormed Manila after the protocol, but the cable had been cut, and they, like Jackson, did not know that the war was ended.

But the result of 1896 is known to all men, and there is no excuse of ignorance to justify fighting anew the battle of the standards in 1900.

Colonel Bryan has again sounded the tocsin of 1896. But there must be proper adjuncts to justify a renewal of this contest. In 1896, surrounded with the wreckage of 1893, 1894, and 1895, he pointed to 1873 as the belated cause of it all and made one of the most notable Presidential campaigns in our history.

Free silver was then the financial Keely motor by which wealth, like power, was to be produced by vibrations of sound.

But in 1899 it takes a bold man to attempt to form the lines again for such a contest.

The smoke of the battle of 1896 has cleared away, and the peaceful smoke of the factory and the forge now again rises and floats over the scene.

It is hard to look with becoming seriousness upon the proposition of our opponents to renew the contest upon the issues of the Chicago platform.

That platform is what Dickens would call "the dearest and buriedest" of all the things of this world.

In 1896 we had an abundance of prophecies upon which to draw. Evil, and that continually, was the foreboding of our opponents, if the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 and consequent silver standard were not adopted.

We were told that the "bryanide of silver" was our only remedy for the ills which all knew to exist. We were assured that the gold standard would result in widespread bankruptcy and ruin, just as in 1878 we were assured that the resumption of specie payments would lead to universal financial calamity.

In 1896, as in 1878, our opponents' evil predictions were not justified by the event.

Many Republicans were swept off their feet in 1896 by the word "gold" in the St. Louis platform. Thousands of them went over to the other side; and without the purchase of votes, but by appealing to the judgment of men in the Democratic party, they came over and not only made good the loss, but aided to cast that half million of majority which has been rewarded by the prosperity which you now enjoy. No man has risen in his place in this House to say that his district is not prosperous. How would that have been but a few years ago, when this silver campaign was going on? On every hand the cohorts of calamity would have appeared and would have borne witness to hard times. The South is rejoicing in prosperity, and I am glad to see it. The price of cotton has gone up along with other products, and as I see my friend from Texas rising to interrupt me, I will ask him if they are not having good times down in Texas?

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman from Iowa to be a frank man, and I desire to ask him a question and trust that he will answer that question frankly. Do you say that the prosperity now in the country is due to the fact that the Republican party is controlling the destinies of this country?

Mr. LACEY. It is due to two causes.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. The Republican party and the God of the universe?

Mr. LACEY. To both. The God of the universe works through terrestrial things. The Republican party is one of those things through which He has worked prosperity in this country. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] My friend would say when the price of cotton was down that the cheapness was due to the Republican party, and now when cotton rises he says the Almighty did it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As the gentleman from Iowa has just mentioned the fact that the price of cotton has risen, does he not know, and does not every man know, that the price of cotton has advanced somewhat this year because the crop is supposed to be short from 25 to 40 per cent as compared with the production of last year?

Mr. LACEY. Now, I am inclined to think that my friend is suggesting only one of the reasons. A few years ago the gentlemen on the other side, if the price of cotton was down, said that was because they did not have free silver; that it could never rise under a gold standard. Now, when cotton rises without free silver, they attribute it to something else.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LACEY. What is the number of bales raised this year?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not know; no man knows.

Mr. LACEY. Has there been any marked decline in the production?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, yes.

Mr. LACEY. My friends on the other side attribute it to a short crop. A few years ago, when the price was low, they ignored the question of the size of the crop and referred all their misfortunes to the crime of 1873.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that cotton is lower now than it was in 1896?

Mr. LACEY. I am not sure of that. What is it selling at now?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. About 7½ cents a pound.

Mr. LACEY. It is selling for more than it did a year or two ago.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me one question more?

Mr. LACEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. The gentleman has attributed the present prosperity to the Republican party. In 1897 wheat sold for a dollar a bushel, and in 1899 at 65 cents a bushel. How do you reconcile that?

Mr. LACEY. I do not reconcile it at all. No political party can make a fixity of prices. I am talking about the general situation of the country. Wheat will go up and wheat will go down, cotton will go up and cotton will go down, whether the Democrats are in power or the Republicans are in power; but a condition of general prosperity and confidence following upon a change of policy involving great industrial and financial issues is worthy of recognition even upon the part of those who opposed the change. Distrust growing out of unwise laws and the threat of still more unwise laws was removed by the election of 1896.

Let us be glad of the result, and as far as possible provide by law against a recurrence of the condition from which we have happily emerged.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to answer the question which he asked a moment ago?

Mr. LACEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understood the gentleman to inquire if there had been any material decline in the yield of cotton this year. It is estimated that the decrease in the yield is not less than 2,600,000 bales, which will account for the very moderate increase in value. I want to say that cotton to-day is selling at unremunerative figures in the great State of Texas. It is bringing 3½ cents a pound less than what was thought to be a remunerative price.

Mr. LACEY. The increase in the cotton product, I think, has been largely due to free labor in the South, and the decline in price has been due largely to the great increase in its production. It is the greatest product of the South, and it is now joining in the general advance. I rejoice at it, and regret that the gentlemen who were so ready to blame the decline in price upon Republican policies are now unwilling to attribute their improved conditions to what seems to us to be so evident.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me for a question?

Mr. LACEY. I can not now; my time is getting limited. The enactment of this law, Mr. Chairman, will not change the standard of value. We have declared in favor of sound money in the past; we have never attempted to write into the statute law an explicit declaration as to what sound money is. Sound money is that which you can convert into the standard of the world.

No more prosperous Treasury report has ever been exhibited in the history of the United States than at the present time. With $1,043,128,338 cash on hand and a net balance of $286,216,439, and with revenues exceeding the current expenses of the Government, notwithstanding the fact that we have just passed out of one war and have nearly concluded another, with all of this immense mass of revenue at our disposal, I say what more remarkable record has been written in the history of the world than is shown by the Treasury report of to-day?

A few years ago we were discussing in this House a bill to extend the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific railroad bonds at 2 per cent for one hundred years, in the hope that thereby we might receive something of the amount due to the Government from these roads. To-day the last dollar of the Union Pacific indebtedness of $56,000,000 has been paid, and payments are rapidly being made on the Central Pacific, and the entire amount of all of this indebtedness about which we felt so much doubt and uncertainty a few years ago will soon be paid in hard cash into the Treasury.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, redeems the pledges of the Republican party made to the people in the past and clarifies the political atmosphere for the year 1900. It is true that Nebraska has gone Populistic—Democratic, if you please. It is true, however, that in other parts of the country the policy of the old party of sound money has received the sanction and the approval of the people at the polls.

A MEMBER. How did Ohio go?

Mr. LACEY (continuing). And on yesterday the city of Boston, almost continuously Democratic for so many years back, has retaken its place in the old fold.

Mr. GAINES. And defeated a Gold Democrat for mayor.

Mr. LACEY. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee has sought to interrupt me. He lives in the State of Tennessee?

Mr. GAINES. Certainly. And the expenditure of $262,000,000 to carry on the war created an enforced demand for certain commodities in the South.

Mr. LACEY. Then the gentleman from Tennessee is willing to admit the suggestion that there is "prosperity in spots?" [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES. Undoubtedly, because you sent there and bought everything in the world which was necessary to carry on the war.

Mr. LACEY. Let me ask the gentleman in what part of the State does he live?

Mr. GAINES. In the blue-grass region of Tennessee, where the Democrats believe in the Constitution of the United States, and believe in the issue of gold and silver currency, and are unwilling to demonetize either. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. Well, are you not doing pretty well, under the circumstances?

Mr. GAINES. Yes, we are; but not owing to Republican legislation.

Mr. LACEY. My friend thinks that his part of the country is doing well, but the people there want to do better. Let me recall the old epitaph on the tombstone of one who tried experiments in life. It read, "I was well, but wanted to be better. I took physic; now I am here." [Laughter and applause.] Now, you want to be better.

Mr. GAINES. We will give you more "physic" in 1900.

Mr. LACEY. In 1892 the people, like the Israelites of old, grew tired of quails and wanted to go back to the leeks and garlic of Egypt.

And the people that year tried the experiment of voting the Democratic party back into power, believing that Grover Cleveland, with his sound-money ideas, would be able to hold them in check. But the first thing that was done when they took possession was to begin that crusade upon our standard of value which paralyzed the industries of this country, and from which we were not relieved until the people in 1896 resolved to return again to the successful policy of the past.

The Republicans have urged two policies as necessary to the national welfare. One was protection, giving employment to the American people. The other was sound money and a gold standard, to pay for that employment with the best money in the world. With these two principles sustained at the polls we have seen a change come. We have seen a change that is as wide as the country, as broad as the land itself, and even my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], radical as he always is, hesitated a while to state which kind of a spot he lives in.

Mr. GAINES. The good spots are mighty scarce, I want to say, and the longer your party keeps in power the scarcer they will get. I do not go where anything is wrong, and hence I am against your policy and your party. I stand on the side of right, here and everywhere.

Mr. LACEY. I always admire the judicial severity of my friend's comments upon any question. A few years ago he criticized us for the hard times, and now that the blue-grass region of Tennessee enjoys good times he admits it, but says he wants them to be better. They will not improve by lowering the standard of money. He is easy to please when one party is in power, and it is impossible to satisfy him when another party is in. But my friend has simply wandered off after this silver fetish. It is remarkable how that has captured the imagination of the people in the Southern States.

And yet, gentlemen, you have to abandon the East, the business interests and the manufacturing interests of the whole country in order to gratify that sentiment. Localities that have been heretofore strongly Democratic could only be carried now by declaring against the policy of that party to-day. I have heard but little said about the ratio of 16 to 1 upon the other side. I am not sure even that my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is still in favor of the sacred ratio of 16 to 1.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am, and so is my party.

Mr. LACEY. You are still for it?

Mr. GAINES. Congress fixed the ratio and we have the right to make it, and you have supported that ratio time and time again and so has your party.

Mr. LACEY. We have declared in favor of the present ratio many times, but we have declared also in favor of maintaining all the money that is coined at a parity with gold. This side of the House has endeavored to aid the silver producer. Silver is an American product, and we have gone almost to the verge of business destruction in our efforts to do something for that metal. We have bought nearly sixteen thousand tons of silver under the Bland-Allison law and under the Sherman law in the vain effort to stem the tide and to bring back once more the old parity between silver and gold at a ratio substantially that which had previously been in use.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, I yield to what is left of the Populist party from Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIDGELY. The gentleman says that his party is pledged to maintain the silver dollar at a parity with the gold dollar. I ask him if he takes the position that the only way in which it is possible for this nation to do that is to make the silver dollars redeemable in gold dollars at the will of the holders?

Mr. LACEY. They must either be redeemable directly or indirectly. We have maintained the parity heretofore by an indirect redemption. That which can be converted into gold will be as good as gold. We have maintained the parity of the silver dollar and of the silver certificate with gold by the fact that you can convert the same into gold, and without that it will be utterly impossible.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LACEY. My time is almost up, and I can not yield.

Mr. RIDGELY. This question bears directly on the first one.

Mr. LACEY. Well, I will yield once more to the gentleman.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does this bill provide directly for the redemption of silver dollars with gold dollars?

Mr. LACEY. It does not.

Mr. RIDGELY. Indirectly, then?

Mr. LACEY. The law heretofore has provided indirectly for substantially the same thing for years. We have long since provided directly for the redemption of half dollars, dimes, and quarters, and the various small coin.

This bill provides for indirect redemption of the dollar and direct redemption, if necessary to maintain it at a parity with gold, and still leaves its legal-tender qualities. By limiting the number of silver dollars we have been able to maintain them in circulation at a parity with gold.

Last year, Mr. Chairman, we coined 18,000,000 of these silver dollars, which is 10,000,000 more than had been coined in the eighty-five years prior to "the crime of 1873."

Now, before I close I want to call the attention of gentlemen on the other side to a Democratic platform of a few years ago, on which they well-nigh carried the country. It reads:

We denounce the failure, for all these eleven years of peace, to make good the promise of the legal-tender notes, which are a changing standard of value in the hands of the people, and the nonpayment of which is a disregard of the pledged faith of the nation.

That is the Democratic platform of a few years ago. To-day, when we are providing practically for the redemption of the greenbacks, our friends say that it should not be done. They throw their hands up in horror, and they say that the thing that they said in this platform ought to have been done years ago ought not to be done now. But let us see the further inconsistency of Democratic platforms:

We denounce the improvidence—

That is, of the Republican party—which in eleven years of peace have taken from the people in Federal taxes thirteen times the whole amount of the legal-tender notes * * * and made no provision for resumption.

And then they wind up by saying:

And as such hindrance we denounce the resumption clause of the act of 1873, and we here demand its repeal.

Those gentlemen, after denouncing us for not resuming specie payment, then demanded the repeal of the law which provides for the specie payment of those notes, and they demanded its repeal on the ground that it would be a hindrance to specie payment. They were in favor of resumption, but opposed to fixing a day. They were like that very great candidate for the Presidency on the platform I have just read, Mr. Tilden. He was in favor of getting married, but opposed to fixing the day, and died a bachelor.

You agree with us already in some things. I believe in your hearts you agree with us upon this money question. I am not here to speak of the Democracy like my friend from Missouri spoke of us. He assumed that everything we do on this side we do from some depraved or immoral purpose. I do not so regard the Democratic party.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LACEY. I can not yield to the gentleman, as my time is about to expire.

Mr. COX. From what platform were you reading?

Mr. LACEY. From the platform of 1876. I believe there are good men on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. COX. Of course there are.

Mr. LACEY. I think you all are, and I do not believe you want our country destroyed. I do not believe even my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] thinks gentlemen on this side of the House want their country ruined or are willing to buy Democrats with money or intimidate them by force. That is talk for one of the "spots" in Missouri for the campaign of 1900. We all desire to do what is best for our common country. We have had experience and the example of what followed from 1896 down to the present time. Do you dare strike down that which you are enjoying? I do not believe you will dare to make a campaign on free silver. You may talk about it bravely now, but when you come to meet your happy, prosperous, and contented people you will not again discuss the propositions involved in the Chicago platform of 1896. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to first call attention to the provisions of this bill:

First. You, the majority, propose by legal enactment to establish the single gold standard.

Second. You make every bond or interest-bearing obligation payable in gold.

Third. You make United States notes (greenbacks) redeemable in gold and prevent their being again paid out except for gold.

Fourth. You make the Treasury notes issued under the law of 1890 and paid out for silver bullion payable in gold.

Fifth. You make all other debts, public and private, which now exist or that shall be contracted payable in gold.

Sixth. You make a division of issue and redemption into which you dump $760,000,000 for redemption purposes.

Seventh. You compel the Secretary of the Treasury to keep $50,000,000 additional in the general fund.

Eighth. You authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds, payable principal and interest in gold, to enable him to keep this $810,000,000 shut up in the Treasury.

Ninth. You make silver exchangeable for gold (redeemable).

Tenth. You authorize the Secretary to coin the silver seigniorage into small money, but you require him to cancel and destroy an equal amount of Treasury notes.

Eleventh. You give power to the Secretary to name the size of the Treasury note bills.

Twelfth. You make it obligatory that silver certificates shall only be issued in one, two, and five dollar bills, destroying silver's power to be used except in small transactions.

Thirteenth. You permit national banks to issue the par value of their bonds, and you reduce their taxes.

Fourteenth. You permit national banks to organize in villages with $25,000 capital, which will have the effect to destroy private banks.

Mr. Chairman, the financial notions and demands of the moneyed class have nearly all been incorporated in the bill before us. The majority have, as near as they dared, followed the demands of the Indianapolis monetary convention. Briefly stated, this bill proposes to enact into law the payment of the entire bonded indebtedness of the Government, principal and interest, in gold, the permanent retirement of the greenbacks and Treasury notes issued under the law of July, 1890, by redeeming them in gold, the redemption of silver with gold when demanded, and the final substitution of national-bank paper for every kind of paper money now in circulation. In other words, the scheme is to make gold the money of final payment for everything and to permit corporations to issue and control the entire paper circulation.

As the representative of a brave, enlightened, honest people I protest against this scheme. I believe it to be un-American, unbusinesslike, unconstitutional, and hurtful to the wealth producers of our country. It means the degradation of the silver money we now have and pledges the money world that we will coin no more. It means the ultimate destruction of one of the constitutional coins of our Government. It means appreciation in the purchasing power of gold and the lowering of prices for the products of labor. It means the contraction or expansion of the paper currency at the will and pleasure of the national banking corporations and consequent paralysis of the business men of small means—the farmer, miner, and mechanic.

It means the weeding out of the middle classes, the bone and sinew of free government, and leaving us two classes, the very poor and the very rich. It means, as I read it, the enslavement of the farmer, miner, country merchant, small banker, mechanic, and day laborer to the money power. This last brings a sneer to the face of the defender, advocate, and apologist of this class, and we are asked, Who and what is the money power?

It is a combination of great bankers and bond owners of Europe and the United States who are neither American, English, French, Belgian, nor German in their real allegiance, but must be regarded as a law unto themselves and a separate power gradually but steadily strengthening their remorseless grip upon the destiny of governments. It is that power that permitted the Turks to murder Armenians, that made terms of peace between Greece and Turkey so as to preserve the solvency of Turkish bonds, that is dismembering China—that has forced this republican Government, in violation of every sentiment of liberty, humanity, and Christianity, to go into world politics, spit on our great past, and deny liberty to a struggling people, and through it all has carried its blood-stained banner of per cent of profit without regard to the claims of justice or the cause of liberty and right.

For twenty-five years there has been slowly but surely developed a determined and unrelenting purpose on the part of the holders of our bonds in Europe and the United States, and of capitalists who control the national banks, to make the bonds of this Government payable in gold, to circumscribe the legal-tender power of silver, and to destroy every kind of paper currency except that of national banks.

In spite of assertion to the contrary, this bill is intended to and will contract the currency, and history teaches that a contraction of capital invariably produces adverse and distressing times, while an abundance of money creates prosperity. But you insist that the payment of bonds and redemption of paper in silver would not be honest, because silver is far below gold. Who is to blame for the price of silver? The men who are demanding the present legislation. You stopped the coinage of silver in 1873. You only permitted a crippled coinage under the law of 1878. You again killed coinage of silver by the law of July, 1890.

Every Administration for more than twenty-five years has tried to destroy the virility of silver. The oft-told tale has been repeated in this debate that the Secretary can not get silver to circulate. The general stock of silver coined amounts to $482,622,376. The statement of the Treasury Department on December 1, 1890, was that there was on that day in circulation in silver dollars $76,232,454, and of silver certificates $394,292,800, or a total of $472,525,250, nearly the whole amount of silver ever coined. But we are told that there has been such an unexampled yield of silver during the last twenty-five years that a tremendous fall in its value has been forced upon the commercial world and has no reference to its not being coined.

Mr. Chairman, this old worm-eaten chestnut has been made to do duty in every debate on the financial question for more than twenty years. In the debate in this House in the Fifty-fifth Congress on the Teller resolutions, it was dragged from its hiding place and paraded as the crowning reason why we should not return to coinage of silver. But the facts do not bear gentlemen out in this contention. The total product of gold and silver from the mines of the United States, 1873 to 1897, inclusive, is, gold, $970,751,327; silver, coinage value, $1,299,000,000.

In that same period the world's production of gold was $3,160,000,000 and of silver $3,381,000,000, coinage value, and the gold production has wonderfully increased since then. From 1861 to 1890 the total product of gold and silver in the world in each hundred dollars' worth of coin was of gold, 36.7, and of silver, 63.3. I pass over the period when Californian and Australian gold discoveries made it so plentiful.

From 1874 to 1896 it was 48 per cent of gold and 52 per cent of silver. Is there any unexampled overproduction of silver in these figures? Gentlemen can satisfy themselves of the truth of these figures by looking at the reports of the Director of the Mint from year to year, and silver has not had a friendly Director of the Mint since I have mixed in politics.

You propose by this bill to make $346,681,016 of United States notes (greenbacks), $89,026,280 of Treasury notes, 482,622,376 silver dollars, and $1,037,049,690 of United States bonds payable in gold—a grand total of $1,955,379,362 made to depend on the ever-changing home of gold and $918,329,672 to be mere token money, the whole amount to depend on the good will of the gold gamblers of the world.

You have not been quite bold enough to declare outright for demonetization of silver and the cancellation of greenbacks, but your bill does propose to have the Treasury exchange gold for silver and to redeem the greenbacks and Treasury notes in gold, which means that every dollar so redeemed will pass out of circulation for all time if you continue in control of the Government. This bill proposes to shut up in the Treasury, in the division of issue and redemption, at one fell swoop, about $760,000,000, and $50,000,000 more must be kept in the general fund. Of this, $260,000,000 must be in gold coin. This will inevitably contract the circulating medium.

And in section 4 of this bill you extend the glad hand to the bondocrats by authorizing the Secretary to issue United States bonds at his own sweet will. You tear down all barriers that have heretofore protected the plain people against the demands of the holders of idle capital, who want to escape taxation by investing in nontaxable bonds. It appears at first glance that the majority intended to expand our money a little by coining the silver seigniorage into subsidiary coin, but they carefully look after that by declaring that a like amount of Treasury notes shall be canceled and not reissued.

Again, the bill before us strikes a deadly blow at all forms of paper currency issued by the Government by giving authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe what sized bills of United States notes and Treasury notes shall be issued, and by declaring that silver certificates shall hereafter only be issued in bills of one, two, and five dollars. The meaning of all this is made plain by the reading of sections 8, 9, 10, and 11 of this bill, which absolutely and without reserve turn over the supreme control of the paper currency of the United States to the national banks.

For seventy years the "money power" has worked and waited, toiled and planned, for the "glad day" which this bill promises. The day is upon us for which Nicholas Biddle and his clan toiled and schemed, prayed and bulldozed, begged and demanded—the control of our monetary system by national banks. You of the majority hope that the banks will buy bonds of the Government and fill the vacant places of silver, greenbacks, and Treasury notes with national-bank paper and expand the currency to meet the demands of trade. You will find that a "hope long deferred," which will "make your heart sick."

I stand with the Democratic party, and with the Populists as well, in never-ending opposition to granting further power to national banks. We find here and there a man who affiliates with the Democracy in favor of such banks and who is willing to see their power augmented. But when you do find such a man he is either uninformed as to the history of our party or he is willing to forego party principles for the sake of gain to himself or his friends. Thomas Jefferson is one of the world's immortals.

Here and there, as we read the history and biography of the centuries, we find a man of marvelous qualities standing out in advance of his fellows. Among them all no finite man outranks Jefferson. As an exponent of human liberty, of individual rights, of government by the people, he is the Colossus of the ages. The honest, the faithful, the natural Democrat goes to his teachings for inspiration to acts of integrity. The Declaration of Independence and his first inaugural address are examples of his wondrous faith in the plain people, and his whole life lessons were in the direction of giving every man an equal opportunity.

The keen foresight with which he had been gifted enabled him to see the dangers of a currency which was controlled by the greed of corporate wealth, and his knowledge of the Constitution, his intense desire to protect our country, impelled him to say:

That Congress has no power to charter a United States bank; that such an institution is one of deadly hostility to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our Republican institutions and the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated "money power" and above the laws and will of the people.

[Applause.]

Having faith in the immaculate democracy of the founder of our party, another great exemplar of American democracy, Andrew Jackson, destroyed the old national bank of the thirties. No less than eight times has the party in national convention endorsed the theory of Jefferson and the action of Jackson. It is a cardinal principle of our party that the Federal Government should not surrender its sovereignty and farm out to corporations the making and control of our paper currency. We are opposed to it because we find no warrant in the Constitution for the Government surrendering its own sovereignty to corporations made up of private individuals. Some vigilant champion of gold and national banks may demand of us why, if we believe what we preach, we do not carry the questions to the courts and have settlement.

Alas, Mr. Chairman, we have learned by bitter experience that he who pleads for the plain people on these great questions rarely reaches the ear of the courts. The power that is to make gold the unit of value and that demands that corporations shall make and control the paper currency has had much to do with making the personnel of the courts. The recent decision of the highest court of our country on the income tax teaches us that judicial precedents and constitutional guaranties cut no large figure these latter days.

We oppose national banks because their charters are special privileges not given other classes of citizens. It is now proposed to enlarge the power of the national banks by issuing to them their full 100 per cent of their bonds and to reduce the taxes on them. Retire the greenbacks and Treasury notes as is suggested, and this will give the control of the currency issue into the hands of the national banks, with power to expand or contract the issue at will. This is a surrender of sovereignty to corporate interests which has been damaging to the interests of the common people in the past; that has helped to unsettle values and brought disaster to business of all kinds.

Let it not be forgotten that in 1881, when Congress attempted to reduce the interest on bonds, these banks retired in one day without notice $18,000,000 of their currency. It is too much power to give to corporations. In this connection I may be pardoned for quoting from one who had some character and standing among the public men of sixty years ago. In a speech in the United States Senate in 1831, this language was used by a Democratic Senator, referring to the United States bank:

The Government itself ceases to be independent, it ceases to be safe, when the national currency is at the will of a company. The Government can undertake no great enterprise, neither of war or peace, without the consent and cooperation of that company; it can not count its revenues for six months ahead without referring to the action of that company—its friendship or its enmity, its concurrence or opposition—to see how far that company will permit money to be plentiful or make it scarce; how far it will let the moneyed system go on regularly or throw it into disorder; how far it will suit the interests or policy of that company to create a tempest or to suffer a calm in the moneyed ocean.

The people are not safe when a company has such power. The temptation is too great, the opportunity too easy, to put up and put down prices; to make and break fortunes; to bring the whole community upon its knees to the Neptunes who preside over the flux and reflux of paper. All property is at their mercy. The price of real estate, of every growing crop, of every staple article, is at their command. Stocks are their playthings, their gambling theater, on which they gamble daily with as little secrecy and as little morality and far more mischief to fortunes than common gamblers carry on their operations. It tends to aggravate the inequalities of fortunes, to make the rich richer and the poor poorer, to multiply nabobs and paupers, and to deepen and widen the gulf which separates Dives and Lazarus.

If there was aught of truth in this picture, made nearly seventy years ago, when we had one United States Bank, how much more potent must be the influence of thousands of national banks which we now have and which are held together as a great trust "by the cohesive power of public and private plunder." As their charters expire, they should be compelled to go out of business as national banks, instead of us enlarging their powers and becoming subject to their baleful influence. Gentlemen on the other side take party credit for the better times in the country. You are persistently following the commands of your former leader, Mr. Blaine, to "claim everything."

The marvelous production of gold in the world during these years, a great deal of which came from our mines, the large demand for our meats and bread in Europe, together with the fact that our manufacturers have gone into the markets of the world with their wares and have successfully competed with foreigners, has given us a mighty balance of trade which, after paying our interest charges abroad, has left us some hundreds of millions more money than we had three years ago. It proves our contention that "more money" makes better prices. But you can not expect this to continue always. One extra large foreign crop will glut our home market, the balance of trade will be against us, gold will flow from us, and under the provisions of this bill we will be bound hand and foot, with every debt made or to be made payable in gold.

Mr. Chairman, who demands this legislation? How many raisers of wheat, corn, cattle, cotton, hogs, tobacco, and fruit appeared before your partisan committee to ask that this proposed bill become the law? How many private bankers, country merchants, miners of coal, lead, and zinc came before you and pleaded for it? How many of the millions of Americans who earn their bread by honest labor have asked you to pay the bonds in gold and cancel Treasury notes and strike down silver? How great was the throng of old Federal soldiers who saved the Union that have begged you to impound and destroy the greenbacks?

Who besides the money changers demand the retirement of the greenbacks? What small country banker or merchant demands it? Who among the millions of farmers have asked it? What great army of laborers want greenbacks redeemed in gold or, in fact, redeemed at all? It is a safe, a sound, a stable currency, and, besides, it was issued by our Government in the exercise of its constitutional sovereign power. It paid the soldiers who fought for and saved the Union. This money bought the bonds which by law are now to be payable in gold. I assert that there is no general demand among the people for the present redemption of greenbacks, but there is a general opposition to their being redeemed in gold and permanently retired.

I was trained and educated to believe that the only legal-tender money authorized by the Constitution was silver and gold, but a Supreme Court dominated by your party declared that Congress had the right to make paper money a legal tender as well. Therefore, with that authority given Congress, I insist that the sovereignty of the Government should be exercised when we need paper money, and not given over to national banks.

When the leaders of gold monometallism bore down the young Ajax from Nebraska, with threats, predictions, prophecies, with unlimited money, with desertions from our party, and with soothing promises of "international bimetalism," they thought the battle over and the "silver craze" forever killed. But they may learn from their own platform of 1892 that "the American people from tradition and interest favor bimetalism." We have seen the commission sent to treat with foreign countries "backcapped" from the Treasury and by the President when he sent in his recommendation to Congress on July 24, 1897.

The people now see clearly that they were buncoed in 1896 with false promises, and now, feeling bold, the Administration, by its pliant Congress, dares to proclaim its purpose to "more firmly establish the gold standard." We welcome the gage of battle. We believe this compact minority will come back to the Fifty-seventh Congress a compact majority and will so demean itself as to be a triumphant party on the Democratic platform of 1896. [Loud applause on Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Fox] is recognized for twenty-five minutes.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Chairman, the financial problems of a great Government like this are by many considered too abstruse and complex for ordinary mortals to grasp. It may be so, but anybody who can tell "a hawk from a handsaw" can see the dishonor and infamy in this bill.

Section 1 of the bill makes the gold dollar the standard unit of value.

Section 2 provides:

That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money, shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in that section.

According to the recent annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there are now outstanding—

United States notes, or greenbacks.....	$346,681,616
Treasury notes, 1890.....	93,518,240
Silver certificates.....	406,083,594
Interest-bearing debt.....	1,016,048,850

The greenbacks and Treasury notes are, under the law and by the express terms of the contract, payable either in gold or silver, at the option of the Government. The silver certificates are mere certificates of deposit, and payable only in silver.

In supporting this measure, which makes all these obligations payable in gold, gentlemen on the other side repudiate that provision of their platform of 1896 which declared in favor of bimetalism. They even have the effrontery to confess in this debate, what we always knew, that the plank in that platform declaring for the double standard by international agreement was and is a humbug. The distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] admits that he was humbugged and declares with emphasis that he will be humbugged no longer.

But this is not all. Gentlemen have a right to change their minds. More eminent gentlemen, or at least gentlemen in more eminent positions, have changed their minds quite as suddenly. The gentlemen who are sent here as the representatives and agents of the people, who are the real debtors who owe all these outstanding obligations, have no right to sit here as the agents of the creditors of the people and repudiate their contracts by striking down half the money of final redemption, thereby making money scarcer and dearer and the terms harder.

Let it be remembered that the people and not the Government are the real debtors. The Government has nothing of its own. Not a cent goes into the United States Treasury except from the pockets of the people through taxation. The Government is simply the agent of the people and negotiated these loans and issued these promises to pay for the people. The holders of these obligations are really the creditors, not of the Government, but of the people. Congress is supposed to sit here as the representatives of the people and not of their creditors; but those who vote for this bill ignominiously desert the people who elected them and sent them here as their representatives, and go over to the creditors of the people, and as their agents and acting under their orders, repudiate their most sacred contracts.

Section 2 of this bill is rank repudiation.

Mr. LINNEY. I should call it extortion.

Mr. FOX. It is absolute repudiation. My friend says it is extortion. I say it is just as much repudiation to require the people to pay more than the contract stipulates as it is to compel the creditor to take less. It is just as dishonest for the creditors to demand more as it is for the debtor to pay less.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It repudiates the contract.

Mr. FOX. It does repudiate the contract. All these obligations are contracts, Mr. Chairman; every one of them. Every promise to pay and every interest-bearing bond is a contract, the holders being the creditors on the one side, and the people being the debtors on the other side; and these contracts may be repudiated by the creditor as well as by the debtor. Whenever a creditor brings about a condition of things which makes it harder for the debtor to pay these debts, it is repudiation.

Whenever he changes the contract so as to enable him to demand more or dearer money, it is just as much repudiation as it is for the debtor to refuse to pay. If the honor of the nation demands that good faith shall be kept with its creditors, still higher and more sacred is the obligation to keep faith with the people, through whose hard toil all the money is raised to pay these creditors. To do less is infamous. It is worse; it is treason.

This section, in so far as it is constitutional and can be made operative in the courts, completely destroys the legal-tender quality of greenbacks and Treasury notes by making all private as well as public debts payable in gold. Nobody will want this money if it will not pay debts, and this provision will, as it was intended to, hasten the retirement of all the paper money, as provided in section 4.

The crowning infamy of this bill is the provision in section 4 for the absolute redemption in gold and retirement of all greenbacks and Treasury notes, to the amount of $440,000,000, at the will of the holders, and the redemption in gold and the retirement of $400,000,000 silver certificates and 57,000,000 silver dollars at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, thus retiring from circulation $900,000,000 of the people's money.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. FOX. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. You said a while ago that these bonds were payable in coin?

Mr. FOX. They are payable either in gold or silver.

Mr. GAINES. Is it not a fact that the Supreme Court of the United States, in the decision given in 7 Wallace, page 26, held that they were payable in coin?

Mr. FOX. It has never been disputed. I understand that it is the very purpose of this bill to change the contract. They are now payable in the coin of the realm, which means either gold or silver. It has been so held by the Supreme Court and by resolutions of both Houses of Congress. It has never been denied by anybody.

Mr. GAINES. Let me read a part of the decision.

Mr. FOX. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but my time is limited.

Mr. Chairman, we have had in this country many distinguished financiers from Alexander Hamilton down to the present day, but it has remained for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], the distinguished author of this bill, to discover for the first time in the history of government, here or elsewhere, that you can strike down and cancel and destroy $900,000,000 of the currency of the country and not decrease the volume of that currency.

When asked the question if it would not decrease the circulation to that amount to redeem $500,000,000 of silver certificates and silver dollars in gold, he replied that it would not, because the Treasury would release the same amount of gold, which would go into the circulation in place of the silver and silver certificates that were taken into the Treasury. A most astounding proposition, Mr. Chairman! The gentleman seems to think that the United States Treasury is an inexhaustible gold mine, from which the Government may take freely without cost and supply any deficiency in the volume of money.

He forgets that the Government is a pauper and can not get a dollar except by taxation or by the issue and sale of bonds. It all comes from the pockets of the people. He forgets that his own bill provides for the sale of bonds at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever it becomes necessary to purchase gold with which to take up this silver and redeem these greenbacks and United States Treasury notes. Where is this gold to come from, Mr. Chairman? It will be purchased from the banks and the people and taken out of circulation, and the circulation will be decreased to that extent. And when the gold is paid out in the redemption of paper currency and silver, they will in turn be taken out of circulation, thus reducing the volume of the currency by $900,000,000.

It is true the bill provides that "the notes and certificates so redeemed or exchanged shall be held as a part of the redemption fund," but it also provides that "they shall not be withdrawn or disbursed except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which said notes or certificates were redeemed or exchanged."

And this means that they are to be perpetually impounded, and might as well be canceled; for who will return gold for this paper currency? No provision whatever is made for the disposition of silver taken in exchange for gold. It is safe to assume that the country will never see it again.

To-day, when our commerce and trade are expanding and there is an unprecedented demand for money, it is a startling proposition to decrease the volume of currency, as is proposed in this bill, by $900,000,000. The quantitative theory of money has been much discussed in this debate and in every debate on the money question, but recent events have conclusively demonstrated that we have not money enough now. The Secretary of the Treasury, a few weeks ago, in order to relieve a stress in the money market, saw proper to pay a year in advance all interest on United States bonds and to purchase $25,000,000 of bonds at the market price. In their annual reports just made the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer of the United States distinctly recognize the quantitative theory of money. The Treasurer in his report says:

It is fair to point out that the Treasury, in this as in previous seasons, has striven to the utmost to meet the demands for currency for moving the crops and for general business. It has exhausted all its resources, and these ought not to be increased by more Government issues. The vast inflow of gold into circulation has been an unmixed blessing and has helped out every industrial and financial interest. This is a legitimate and permanent contribution to our money. It is likely to continue and to grow. Beyond such increase in gold the national banks must solve the problem of aiding to the volume of currency.

Referring to the recent stress in the money market, the Secretary of the Treasury in his report says:

Interest, or, more truly speaking, the bank's charge for exchanging its credit against private credit, rose from 2½, 3, and 4 per cent to 10, 15, 25, and 40 per cent. The elements of the currency which bank credits furnished was contracted within a period of nine weeks to the extent of $84,000,000. In common parlance, deposits were reduced to that extent. Put in the shortest form: In order to supply the interior with the use of a medium of exchange for a few weeks, to the amount of $25,000,000, havoc was wrought in the regular on-going of our commercial life.

But you say it is expected that under the enlarged privileges given to national banks by this bill they will supply the deficiency by a larger issue of bank notes. You stand on the recommendation of the Treasurer, which I have just quoted, that the "national banks must solve the problem of adding to the volume of currency." You have no assurance that they will do this. But suppose they do? The issuance of legal-tender money is a function of the Government. It has been so declared by the Supreme Court. It is a constitutional prerogative and duty. Why abdicate that prerogative and turn it over to private corporations?

Last summer, in his tour over the United States, the President of the United States frequently boasted that we had a safe, sound currency, every dollar of which is as good as every other dollar. Why change? Why give the banks a monopoly of issuing money, thus forming the most gigantic trust of the age, a money trust, that will give a few corporations absolute control of the currency of the country? Of course, gold will not circulate. It, being the only money of final redemption, will all be locked up in the banks, and bank notes will be the only money in circulation, and its volume will be entirely in control of the banks.

Certainly bank notes are not safer than United States notes. Behind the greenbacks are 70,000,000 of people and the unlimited resources of this great country, with the taxing power of Congress to fill the Treasury with money of final redemption. It is a curious thing that it is insisted by the capitalists of the country that there should always be sufficient gold in the Treasury to redeem outstanding obligations when presented, and yet we have the present distinguished Secretary of the Treasury for authority that banks rarely pay any debts they owe in money, but pay them in their own promises to pay. In his recent annual report he says:

It is a popular delusion that the bank deals in money. Money is an incident in its dealings—an important incident, no doubt—but, truly speaking, an incident only. The bank deals in credits. For a consideration, varying according to time, place, and circumstances, it gives to the people with whom it deals its own debt obligations in exchange for the debt obligations of its dealers and customers. The obligations of the bank thus created are generally evidenced by a credit upon its books to the dealer, who has the right to draw upon it by his checks or drafts and as his convenience may be served.

The constant interchange of credits between the bank and its dealers, with the enormous volume of checks and drafts passing between buyer and seller, constitutes in the broadest sense the currency of the country. It is these instruments which trade uses in much the larger part of all its operations. Money—real money, gold or silver—plays but a small part in the multitudinous exchanges.

He further says:

It is impossible for anyone to name a good reason why the indebtedness of the banker in the field of exchanges should not be expressed as freely in his notes of hand of convenient size as in one consolidated entry to the credit of his dealer upon his books of account. It is precisely at this point that difficulty, embarrassment, and loss are occasioned. What would be a natural economy and effective operation is, by the inhibition and restriction of law, now made impossible. In a state of freedom the extraordinary wants of the country at harvest time would be largely, if not wholly, met by the conversion of bank balances not available for these general purposes into bank notes or paper money.

Referring to the fact that great masses of money had to be sent out recently into the country to move the crops and to meet the demands of the great industrial movement in the country, he says:

If the New York banks could have issued their notes in the form of paper money, they would have furnished them and thus discharged the credits standing upon their books, and this would have entirely satisfied interior and Western needs. In that case there would have been no expansion of credit. By so much as notes were issued by so much book credits would have been canceled. The bank statement would have been expressed in different form with no material change in fact.

Two important deductions may be made from these extracts:

First. There is a real demand for more instead of less money.
Second. The banks are not satisfied with the United States notes, with gold and silver in the Treasury for their redemption. They are not willing for an increase of this currency. They want to use their own promises to pay, and keep all the real money in their vaults. They complain because they had to send so much money into the country.

It is a fact that there is more money in actual circulation in the country to-day than ever before since the war, and it is due to this fact, that the country is perhaps more prosperous than ever before. It is the amount of money in circulation that makes prosperity, rather than the volume of money. Money locked up, that does not circulate, contributes nothing to the prosperity of the country.

Mr. Chairman, it is a dangerous policy to surrender to the banks the control of the money of the country. Those who control the currency of the country and dictate its financial policy can control the business and government of the country. They can raise or depress prices. They can create a bounteous plenty or a ruinous panic. They can make money scarce or abundant. They can dictate the wages of labor. They can elect governors, Congressmen, legislators, and judges. This bill creates the greatest of all trusts and makes possible all trusts.

In a recent magazine article Bishop Potter, of New York, said:

In the great industrial and financial combinations which are the special feature of our day it must be admitted that it is the gain of the few and not the equities of the many which are chiefly kept in view.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the utterance of a politician appealing to the prejudices of the masses. Nor was it spoken by a toiler who was blinded and maddened by the hard conditions of his life. It is the candid admission of a gentleman who preaches, not in country meetinghouses or in the slums of the city, but in palatial cathedrals to the richest congregations on earth. It is the truth.

I would excite no prejudice against capital. Large fortunes and even combinations of large fortunes are necessary to carry on the great enterprises of the world. But they should keep their hands off of government. They have no business to control legislation, the administration of the laws, or the financial policy of government. Bishop Potter is right. Human nature is selfish.

Bankers are no worse and no better than the balance of mankind, and in their great financial and business operations they think not of the "equities of the many," but are looking solely to their own gain; and I want to warn you now that you commit the greatest crime of the closing century when you rob the people of their dearest constitutional prerogative and surrender to the banks the right to control the currency and dictate the financial policy of the country.

While capital should be protected, it is not the only sacred thing in the country. We must have some regard for the muscle that toils, the back that bends under its heavy burden, and the brain that grows weary with unremitting labor. "The man with the hoe" is as much entitled to consideration as the man with the bonds.

Mr. Chairman, my friends on this side of the Chamber say that the people will call you to account in the next Presidential election. I do not think so. They would if they were free; but they will be shackled hand and foot. The laborer in the mines and factories will be at your mercy. You will control the money of the country, and therefore control labor and wages. With your hand on the throat of the laborer, he dare not thwart your wishes. He is absolutely at your mercy. You can crucify him, and will do it if it is necessary. You will buy everybody that can be bought and intimidate everything that can be bulldozed.

What will the end be? As sure as God reigns, right will finally triumph. Many close students of history say that every great step forward in the progress of the world is made through bloodshed and revolution. Is it not possible for this cup to pass from us? For the sake of humanity and the Carpenter's Son, who died for humanity, I appeal to you gentlemen who represent the wealth of the country to avert this great calamity. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, although I am as strong an advocate of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 as any member upon this floor, I can not see from the provisions in this bill that the questions of bimetalism and free coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1, or any other ratio, are involved. As I understand it, it is simply a proposition to change the monetary conditions as they exist in the United States to-day. The questions of bimetalism, the free coinage of both gold and silver, are not involved, except what is the difference between them and the single gold standard. This bill proposes to do that which no party has ever dared to say in its national platform.

While I appreciate the fact that the Republican platform of 1896 said that it favored the gold standard unless bimetalism could be obtained through international agreement, yet we all know that the solemn pledge of the Republican party was not as expressed in this bill. I desire, before I begin in the main what I shall have to say, to show how the Republican party upon this floor has departed from the pledges and promises as made by the candidate of their party, President McKinley, in his letter of acceptance in 1896. This is what he said, and when I have read it I desire to call the attention of the gentlemen on the other side to the pledges of the President of the United States in regard to the silver and paper money in this country.

This is in part the letter of acceptance of President McKinley: It is not proposed by the Republican party to take from the circulating medium of the country any of the silver that we now have. On the contrary, it is proposed to keep all of the silver money now in circulation on a parity with gold, maintaining the pledge of the Government that all of it shall be equal to gold. This has been the unbroken policy of the Republican party since 1873. It is inaugurating no new policy. It will keep in circulation and as good as gold all of the silver and paper money which are now included in the circulation of the country.

That was the written pledge of Candidate McKinley in connection with the platform of his party, and you pledged through him, when you asked the votes of the people of the United States in 1896, that not only the silver dollar but all paper money in the United States should be kept in circulation.

We have the solemn pledge of your candidate, to which I have just referred. How is it with regard to the pending bill? Will any gentleman on the other side of the House stand up and deny that any of the provisions of the bill complies with the declaration of your President? On the contrary, we are told by gentlemen on that side of the House that at a given hour on Monday next the House is to pass this bill, the effect of which is that when the greenbacks are taken to the Treasury and redeemed in gold they will never be reissued or taken from the Treasury unless gold is presented and demand made for their exchange.

Dare any gentleman on that side of the House stand up and say that that is not withdrawing the greenbacks from circulation and reducing the currency of the people to that extent? Can any of you do it? I pause for an answer. Is there any man on that side of the House who dares to stand up and risk his reputation in denial of this proposition?

What else do we find? That the Treasury notes, which under the Sherman Act were issued for the purchase of silver bullion, are to be retired in like manner as the greenbacks. In section 3 of the Sherman Act of 1890 is the following language:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall each month coin 2,000,000 ounces of silver bullion, purchased under the provisions of this act, into standard silver dollars, until the 1st day of July, 1891, and after that time he shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for.

From this it will be seen the purpose of said act was that these Treasury notes should be redeemed in standard silver dollars; but this purpose was ignored by the Administrations of Harrison, Cleveland, and McKinley, and they have persistently been redeemed in gold, helping to make what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] has called the "endless chain."

The inquiry I put to the gentleman who has charge of the bill now before the committee, Mr. OVERSTREET, of Indiana, and the colloquy arising thereupon, which I adopt as a part of my remarks, explains itself:

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. In reference to the silver dollars, when they are taken to the Treasury and redeemed in gold, what is to become of them after they have been received by the Treasury? Are they to be paid out again or not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There are two alternatives. The first is, they may be returned to trade upon the presentation of gold for their exchange, or they may be transferred by the Secretary of the Treasury from the redemption fund to the fiscal fund and used in the discharge of Government expenses.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Then if they are paid out in due course of trade and transferred to this fund that the gentleman speaks of, do they not then become an endless chain in themselves, the same as you say the greenbacks and Treasury notes do?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, sir; for the following reason—

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Will the gentleman answer that? If they are paid out in the due course of trade, can they not be taken back and gold demanded, and then go the round again for another endless chain, like the one the gentleman has talked of in reference to greenbacks and Treasury notes? I would like the gentleman to make that clear.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am perfectly willing to answer the gentleman's question. I may say that I think I have answered it very conclusively in the argument I have prepared, but in order to deal with entire fairness with the gentleman I will answer his question now. Under the present law an endless chain is created, because the greenback is reissued immediately and may again seek its way to the Treasury for a second redemption. That is stopped by the proposition which I have just elaborated in my argument. Under the proposed law the silver dollar, if exchanged for gold, would be returned to trade upon presentation of gold for another exchange of the silver, or it may be returned from one fund (the redemption fund) to another (the fiscal fund) by the Secretary of the Treasury. Just at that point is to be found the reason why an endless chain of silver dollars can not occur. It is the Secretary of the Treasury who has that option and right to transfer the silver dollar and pay it out, and it only goes out in the payment of the expenses of the Government.

What was his reply? He said that when the silver dollars are exchanged for gold they will go into the redemption fund; that they can not be reissued unless by an order of the Secretary of the Treasury transferring them to the general fund.

In section 3 of this bill I find the following:

SEC. 3. That there be established in the Treasury Department, as a part of the office of the Treasurer of the United States, a division to be designated and known as the division of issue and redemption, to which shall be assigned, under such regulation as the Secretary of the Treasury may approve, all records and accounts relating to the issue, redemption, and exchange, as herein provided, of the several kinds of United States money. There shall be transferred from the general fund in the Treasury of the United States, and taken up on the books of said division as a redemption fund, the amount of gold coin and bullion held against outstanding gold certificates, the amount of United States notes held against outstanding currency certificates, and the amount in silver dollars and silver bullion held against outstanding Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890; and an amount of gold coin and bullion to constitute a reserve fund equal to 25 per cent of the amount, both of United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, outstanding. The gold and silver coins and bullion transferred from the general fund in the Treasury, as herein provided, shall be increased or diminished, as the case may be, in accordance with the provisions of this act and in no other way.

From which it will be seen all the silver dollars and silver bullion in the "general fund," as designated by this bill, are transferred to the "redemption fund," never again to reach the channels of trade unless the Secretary of the Treasury, by special order, transfers them to the general fund to be paid out upon the expenses of the Government. And this, Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted this Republican Administration will never do. For has not the President, Mr. McKinley, in his message to Congress, recommended the impounding of the greenbacks and Treasury notes to stop what the Republicans and gold-standard advocates call the "endless chain?" So, if you are honest in your contention to stop the endless chain, the silver dollars must be as effectually impounded as the greenbacks and Treasury notes.

To-day there are in the Treasury of the United States, in round numbers, 400,000,000 of silver dollars, represented by outstanding silver certificates, less $6,000,000 of silver certificates in the Treasury; standard silver dollars of 1890, in round numbers, $7,000,000. The total amount of standard silver dollars, in round numbers, coined to date is 490,000,000, leaving between seventy-five or eighty millions of silver dollars in circulation.

Mr. Chairman, at this point the thought presents itself, What, under this bill, will become of the $394,000,000 of outstanding silver certificates? A reference to the bill shows they are to receive the same fate as the standard silver dollars, or they will become an endless chain, and of course you gentlemen on that side have provided in this bill against any such contingency.

In section 4, page 4, from line 6 to line 19, inclusive, is the following, to wit:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to use said reserve fund in maintaining at all time the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government; and if at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, he may at his discretion exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States. The notes and certificates so redeemed or exchanged shall be held in and constitute a part of said redemption fund and shall not be withdrawn therefrom nor disbursed except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which said notes or certificates were redeemed or exchanged, except as hereinbefore in this section provided.

We see that a knock-out blow has been provided for the silver certificates. In order to do what this bill calls "maintaining the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States," the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States. When silver certificates are taken to the Treasury and gold demanded, they must be paid in that money or the gold advocates will cry out that the parity of our moneys is not preserved and the credit of the Government is in peril; so into the redemption fund the silver certificates must go to keep company with the silver dollar.

By a little addition we see that when the purposes of this bill are carried out, the currency of the country will be contracted to the extent of the greenbacks, Treasury notes, and silver dollars—in amount exceeding $800,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, is there any truth in the contention of the advocates of the gold standard that if the Secretary of the Treasury exercised the right of the Government to pay the greenbacks and Treasury notes in silver—they being payable in coin at the option of the Treasurer—this would in any way affect the parity of our money or the credit of our Government? I assert here that it would not. We have before us the example of the French Government, with a population of less than 38,000,000 people, who has in her financial system 900,000,000 silver 5-franc pieces (or dollars), a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, and which, with gold in nearly equal amounts, constitutes the reserve of the Bank of France. The notes issued by the bank, like our greenbacks and Treasury notes, are payable in standard coin. The bank to-day, as it has done since 1873, pays either gold or silver coin in redemption of its notes at its option, and has never surrendered to the holder of its notes this right. And whenever an effort is made to trench upon the gold part of the reserve of the Bank of France the bank pays those who present her notes 95 per cent in silver and 5 per cent in gold.

Mr. Chairman, for fear that some Republican member may be doubtful upon this subject I will give good Republican authority. During the extra session of the Fifty-third Congress, called by Grover Cleveland, Mr. Hendrix, a banker, gold-advocate Democrat, member of this House from the State of New York, was discussing the evil results to the Government by the so-called endless chain, by its having to redeem the greenbacks and Treasury notes in gold, and if it refused its credit would be ruined, when a distinguished Republican member interrupted him and denied that if the Secretary of the Treasury exercised his option, instead of surrendering it to the holder of the greenbacks or Treasury notes, and paid in silver dollars, that this act would affect the credit of our Government or the value of our money, and cited the example of the Bank of France that I have just mentioned above, and this gentleman is the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. HEPBURN, of Iowa.

Mr. Chairman, if John G. Carlisle, while Secretary of the Treasury, had refused to pay out gold for the greenbacks and Treasury notes at the demands of the "gold gamblers," and had exercised the option which the law gave him to pay in either gold or silver dollars and had paid in silver, the burden of two hundred and sixty millions of bonded debt which he issued would not now be fastened upon the taxpayers of this country; and if President McKinley had made his Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage, exercise this option in favor of the people instead of surrendering it to these same gamblers, it would not have been necessary for him to place an additional two hundred millions of bonded debt upon the country.

What member upon this floor, who has any regard for the truth, will contend that if ex-Secretary Carlisle or Secretary Gage had refused to pay gold for the greenbacks and Treasury notes when presented for redemption, but had paid silver dollars, that either our credit or money, at home or abroad, would in the least have been affected? Can not this, the most powerful nation in the world, with only four hundred and ninety millions in silver dollars and not less than seventy-five millions of population, do what the Bank of France is doing every day, and maintain the parity of value of all our money?

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana has told us that the reason the standard silver dollar is worth 100 cents in gold is because, under the parity clause of the law, there is a gold dollar behind every silver dollar. I tell the gentleman that the first time the "parity clause" ever appeared in the statutes of the United States was in the Sherman act of 1890, and I challenge him, or any member on that side, to mention a time when a standard silver dollar was ever worth less than one hundred cents in gold, and for thirty-six years was worth from 1 to 3 cents more than a gold dollar, and I tell him that, in all the past history of the Treasury of this Government not one standard silver dollar has been redeemed in gold. Even Cleveland's Administration did not dare do this, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] told us in his speech that Grover Cleveland was the archenemy of silver. Yes; he was.

I agree with the gentleman. No man, not even excepting the discarded statesman from Ohio, Mr. Sherman, has been a more bitter enemy of the white metal than Grover Cleveland. He perverted the principles of his party and prostituted, with the gift of offices, men high in the councils of his party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I agree with you that Grover Cleveland was the archenemy of the Democratic party [applause on the Democratic side], for he came near wrecking it; but the people wrested his control from him and cast out the men who had followed him, and so far as I am concerned, if they want to come back into the Democratic party let them come back and take their medicine and be Democrats. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, section 1 of this bill provides that the standard unit of value shall be the gold dollar, and shall consist of 23.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle.

Section 2 of the bill is as follows:

SEC. 2. That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section. Nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar, or of the subsidiary or minor coins, or of the paper currency of the United States, or the laws making national bank notes receivable and payable for certain public debts and dues and obligations between national banks.

Thus we see, if this bill becomes a law, all the obligations of the Government, past and future, all the private debts of our people, past or future, are to be paid in gold.

Mr. Chairman, every bond of the Government, including the two hundred and sixty millions issued during Cleveland's Administration and the two hundred millions issued by this Administration, are payable in standard silver and gold dollars, and have stamped upon each bond, "payable in standard coin of the weight and value of the act of July 14, 1870," and to-day the four hundred and eighty-two millions of standard silver dollars are a legal tender for all debts, public and private.

Section 4 of this bill gives the Secretary of the Treasury the authority—to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of the said (gold) reserve fund, bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable in gold coin at the option of the United States after one year.

This section of the bill gives the Secretary of the Treasury unlimited power to issue gold bonds.

By sections 8 and 9 of this bill the national banks are authorized to issue notes to the par value of these bonds.

Section 10 removes the tax on national bank notes and puts a tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent upon their franchises, measured by their capital stock, undivided surplus, and profits.

Section 11 is as follows:

Sec. 11. That section 5138 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 5138. No association shall be organized with a capital of less than $100,000, except that banks with a capital of not less than $50,000 may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 6,000 inhabitants, and except that banks with a capital of not less than $25,000 may, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 2,000 inhabitants. No association shall be organized in a city the population of which exceeds 50,000 persons with a capital of less than $200,000."

From which we see that banks with not less than $50,000 capital, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may be formed in places which do not exceed 6,000 in population, and banks with not less than $25,000 capital, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may be formed in places where the population does not exceed 2,000. Under this section the Secretary of the Treasury, if he so desires, can punish a community by refusing to grant banking privileges, a power no Secretary should have.

When this bill becomes a law what will be its effect upon the people? It establishes the single gold standard; retires all the greenbacks, Treasury notes, silver dollars, and silver certificates; gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power to place upon the people a perpetual debt, and makes them the prey of the gold trust and the national banks. The Republican party in this House and in the Senate, we are told, will pass this bill with all its aggravated evils; gentlemen of that side boast that when in caucus considering it not a single Republican voted against it. You turn your backs upon your records, which so far have been in opposition to every provision of this bill, and the only excuse you give is that you have changed your minds, that you are a progressive party, and that we upon this side of the House are, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] puts it, "not up to date." The proudest boast on this side is that we still worship the eternal principles in the interest of mankind as enunciated and taught by Jefferson, Jackson, and the fathers of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You are doing now what John Sherman years ago warned you not to do. On page 533 of Sherman's Autobiography you can read:

I think that America by deciding in favor of the double valuation would not only save the world at large from an abyss and prevent the accomplishment of a stupid general crime whose authors humanity would some day learn to curse, but that she would advance her own interests more than may be supposed possible.

On page 531 of the same book he uttered these memorable words:

These two metals, gold and silver, have traveled side by side from the beginning of time. The records of human history do not go back to a time when they did not move together. They have varied in value, sometimes one and sometimes the other being higher, but they have gone on, gold the money of the rich, silver the money of the poor, the one to measure acquired wealth, the other to measure the daily necessities of life.

You are doing now what William McKinley, speaking at Toledo, Ohio, on the 12th day of February, 1891, warned you not to do. He said:

You are setting up "gold, the money of the rich," and you are destroying "silver, the money of the poor;" you are destroying one of our precious metals, one of our own products, destroying silver and enhancing the price of gold. You are determined to contract the circulating medium, limit the volume of money among the people, "make money scarce and therefore dear."

When this bill becomes law you will have "increased the value of money" and will have "diminished the value of everything else." You are determined you will make "money the master everywhere, everything else the servant."

I warn you that this evil brood which you are about to turn loose upon the people will before long return to plague you, and its multiplied evils upon the people will bring them to the realization that their only hope of relief is in the success of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has told us, in his usual impressive way, that immediately succeeding the election of Cleveland by the Democratic party in 1893, "Confidence fled and depression and hard times were felt by all the industrial interests of the country." I admit this was true, but these results were not caused by Cleveland attempting to carry out and enforce Democratic principles. The daily press of New York and of the Eastern cities, through the Associated Press, told how the Cleveland Administration, in connection with the great metropolitan bankers of New York, Boston, Chicago, and the "solid communities" of the East, combined to bring about the hard times which cursed this country during all Cleveland's Administration.

In the Washington Post of the 28th of April, 1893, and every other Eastern daily that received the Associated Press dispatches, there appeared the following account of Secretary Carlisle's conference, Mr. Cleveland at that time being in New York with the New York bankers:

WASHINGTON, Friday, April 23, 1893.

Carlisle meets bankers. No issue of bonds unless all other expedients fail. A New York conference. The Secretary frankly enlightens prominent financiers as to the policy of the Government and states that nothing will be left undone to secure the repeal of the Sherman law when Congress assembles. Result of conference.

NEW YORK, April 27.

Secretary Carlisle decided this morning to have a talk with the New York bankers. Late on Wednesday evening, after his arrival from Washington, he conferred with Assistant Treasurer Jordan and ex-Assistant Treasurer Charles J. Canda. As a result the Secretary this morning suggested that he meet the bank presidents and private bankers at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The postponement of the naval review because of the storm caused some delay, as Secretary Carlisle accompanied President Cleveland on the Dolphin. The Secretary landed with the Presidential party at the foot of Ninety-sixth street, and was there met by the Columbian reception committee, including President J. Edward Simmons, of the Fourth National Bank. The Secretary and Mr. Simmons were driven to the home of President George Williams, of the Chemical Bank, and chairman of the Clearing House Association, at No. 34 West Fifty-eighth street.

The conference between the Secretary and the bank presidents lasted somewhat over an hour. There was the utmost good feeling displayed and the Secretary said he was there to make a frank, free, and open statement of what he believed to be the financial policy of the Government.

As the Secretary outlined the policy of the Government, it was shown nothing would be done that in any way would retard or check the determination of the Cleveland Administration concerning the repeal of the Sherman law. The Secretary went over the currency laws of the country and said that they were in bad shape and needed revision. He said the revision would start with the Sherman law. There is a determination also to show the miners of silver the evil effects of the Sherman law in their fortunes.

President Cleveland's advisers have told him that the only way to induce the Western and Southwestern Senators and Congressmen to consent to a repeal of this Sherman law is to demonstrate to their constituents that they are losing money every day that this law is in operation. The missionary work in that direction has been started by a number of the bankers in the solid communities of the East. They are daily refusing credits to the South, Southwest, and West.

The Chicago bankers, it was said, are carrying out the same line of policy. Secretary Carlisle, in his talk with the bankers, made his stand very clear. It is to be heroic treatment all the way through.

The bank presidents, replying to Secretary Carlisle, cordially informed him that they would be ready at all times to cooperate with him in the successful administration of the financial policy of the Government. Everybody shook hands and there was harmony all around.

Here we have President Cleveland and his Secretary of the Treasury, on the 27th day of April, 1893, less than two months after his inauguration, in conference with the great millionaire bankers of New York, devising "ways and means" to bring on a financial panic in the United States. How? By "daily refusing credits to the South, Southwest, and West" and the Chicago bankers "carrying out the same line of policy," and every member upon the floor knows this policy was adopted by the banking corporations, great and small, throughout the United States. "Secretary Carlisle, in his talk with the bankers, made his stand very clear." "It is to be heroic treatment all the way through." "Everybody shook hands, and there was harmony all round."

Mr. Chairman, was there ever a more infamous compact against the interest, well-being, and happiness of our people? The great Republican and gold standard press of the country joined in the hue and cry that the silver bullion purchase and coinage clause of the Sherman Act of 1890 was the cause of the want of confidence in the country. I have already met and shown the fallacy of this contention in the policy of the Bank of France.

In furtherance of this evil compact many of the great tariff-protected manufacturing corporations began to reduce the wages of their employees, and many of these establishments closed their doors for months at a time, throwing out of employment thousands of men, and brought want and misery to hundreds of thousands of people.

The smaller banks of the country pursued the same policy, forced in their loans, refused credit to their former customers, and wrecked the fortunes of thousands of honest, deserving men, and brought their families to actual want. In order that we might have, as these corporations claimed, "sound money" and "an honest" dollar, Cleveland and Carlisle, with their Republican allies, were doing that which in 1891 William McKinley had denounced as "destroying one of our precious metals, one of our great products, discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold," limiting "the volume of money among the people," "making money scarce and therefore dear," "increasing the value of money and decreasing the value of everything else," "making money the master and everything else the servant."

The gentleman from Ohio has also told us that when the Republican party again came into power by the election of President McKinley in 1896, confidence was restored, wages of the employees in the manufactories began and have continued to be increased, and that these things were due to the success of the Republican party.

Mr. Chairman, who are the recipients of the prosperity that the gentleman so much boasts of? I assert here that the average wages of the employees in the tariff-protected manufacturing industries are not as high to-day as they were on the 1st day of January, 1893, in the face of the fact that the manufacturers have put up the price of their products in the past twelve months from 100 to 200 per cent and in some instances 300 per cent.

Take iron, nails, fencing wire, barbed and woven wire, etc., over 300 per cent; every article that the laborers and farmers have to buy enormously increased in price; coal, wall paper, agricultural implements, furniture, food products, rubber goods, queen's ware, glass—in fact, every article controlled by these trusts, almost too innumerable to mention, have been arbitrarily increased in price by these corporate trusts to pay dividends on fictitious capital, as ex-Senator Ingalls says, "By methods that make larceny respectable."

Mr. Chairman, I ask gentlemen on that side, Why is it that there has not been a corresponding rise in the prices of the products of the farm? The reason is easily given. These trust combinations of corporate wealth meet and fix the price of their manufactured products, and the farmers and laborers must do without them or pay the trust prices. So they meet and fix the price of what the farmers have to sell, and they must take it or their products go unsold.

Unless the history of the financial legislation of the past reverses itself, the adoption of the single gold standard by this country and the striking down of our silver money, greenbacks, and Treasury notes will result most disastrously to the people of the United States. England destroyed silver in 1816, and its effects, as given by the great English historian, Alison, I quote:

The effects of this extraordinary piece of legislation were soon apparent. The industry of the nation was speedily congealed, as a flowing stream is by the severity of an arctic winter. The alarm became as universal and widespread as confidence and activity had recently been. The country bankers, who had advanced largely on the stocks of goods imported, refused to continue their support to their customers, and they were forced to bring their stocks into market. Prices in consequence fell rapidly, that of cotton, in particular, sank in three months to half its former level. * * * The effects of this sudden and prodigious contraction of the currency were soon apparent, and they rendered the next three years a period of ceaseless distress and suffering in the British Islands. * * * The effect upon prices was not less immediate or appalling. They declined in general within six months to half their former amount and remained at that low level for the next three years. Distress was universal in the latter months of 1819, and that distrust and discouragement were felt in all branches of industry which are at once the forerunner and cause of disaster.

I need scarcely recur to the demonetization of silver and the suspension of the free coinage of silver in 1873-74 by the United States and Germany, and the consequent contraction of the standard money of the world, and the financial panic in the United States for a period of five years, until the Bland Act of 1878 was passed, restoring the full legal-tender quality of silver dollars and providing for the coinage of $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion into standard dollars per month. The effect of this legislation was an expansion of the money of the country, followed by rising prices in every industry of the United States; again, in 1890, upon the passage of the Sherman Act, which added four millions of Treasury notes to the circulating medium by the purchase of silver bullion. The effect of this act is described by President Harrison in the following language (message to Congress, December, 1890):

It is gratifying to know that the increased circulation secured by the act has exerted, and will continue to exert, a most beneficial influence upon business and general values.

Admitting that a few of the products of our farmers are higher than a few years ago—wheat and corn are lower now in price than at this time last year—does this prove that the election of Mr. McKinley brought about these results? Did the success of the Republican party make a short cotton crop in the South in 1899? Did it make bounteous crops in one section and short ones in another? Did it produce the famines in India and some parts of Russia? Did it make the gold output rise from $33,000,000 in the United States in 1892 to $64,000,000 in 1898, and in the world from $138,000,000 in 1892 to $287,463,000 in 1898?

Mr. Chairman, had it not been for this enormous increase in gold enlarging the volume of standard money, who can doubt the disastrous financial results that would have irresistibly overtaken this country? The world's production of gold shows that these large yields only last for a few years, and when this large output has ceased, as it surely will, the evils of this bill will convince the Republican party that it has "courted fate" once too often. Allison, from whom I have already quoted, wrote of the results of the discoveries of gold and silver in the '40s in America and Australia, as follows:

The annual supply of gold and silver for the use of the globe was by these discoveries suddenly increased from an average of 10,000,000 pounds to one of 35,000,000 pounds. The era of a contracted currency and consequent low prices and general misery, interrupted by passing gleams of prosperity, was at an end. Prices rose rapidly and rose steadily; wages advanced in a similar proportion; exports and imports enormously increased, while crime and misery as rapidly diminished. Wheat rose from 40 shillings to 55 shillings and 60 shillings; but the wages of labor advanced in nearly as great a proportion; they were found to be about 30 per cent higher on an average than they had been five years before. In Ireland the change was still greater, and probably unequaled in so short a time in the annals of history. Wages of country labor rose from 4 pence a day to 1 shilling 6 pence or 2 shillings; convicted crime sank nearly half, and the increased growth of cereal crops under the genial influences of these advanced prices was for some years as rapid as its previous decline since 1846 had been. At the same time decisive evidence was afforded that all this sudden burst of prosperity was the result of the expanded currency, and by no means of free trade, in the fact that it did not appear till the gold discoveries came into operation, and then it was fully as great in the protected as in the free-trade States.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill becomes a law the Republican party will have carried out its contract with the millionaire bankers and corporations—the price they paid, giving their millions to secure the election of William McKinley, President of the United States, with the further condition that they are to contribute again to the Republican campaign fund of 1900.

When this bill becomes a law, these are the evils that will be fastened on the people: The single gold standard, and all debts, public and private, now payable in any lawful money of the United States, gold, silver, greenbacks, and Treasury notes, made redeemable alone in gold; the contraction of the currency $3,000,000; authority given the Secretary of the Treasury to issue gold bonds in an unlimited amount, fastening upon the people a perpetual interest-bearing debt as a basis for the national banks; the placing the people of the United States in the ruthless clutches of the gold trust and the national banks by giving to the banks the authority to issue their bills as the only paper money of the country, making them the rulers of the people and the masters of the price of labor and the fruits of labor. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the gold standard by the progressive nations of the earth is inevitable. No arbitrary act or conventional arrangement leads to this result. It is a feature of that evolution which is characteristic of the age. We have made the mistake of ascribing too much importance to legislative enactments for the demonetization of silver, and have given too little attention to the working of those underlying forces and principles whose behest legislators and finance ministers must obey. It is not a matter of perversity of legislators or conspiracy of financiers; it is the logic of events.

In bringing about this condition three great central facts are prominent. First, the necessity in this present era for selecting for the operations of trade and industry the simplest and most convenient instruments. That means that we will select the lighter metal rather than the heavier, or other qualities giving equal advantages, the one which has the greatest value with the least weight. Second, the impracticability of bimetalism as a principle. Third, the great growth in gold production in the last fifty years, which has made possible the adoption of the changes promoted by the first two facts.

First, in regard to the selection of the simplest instruments, historically speaking, diverse commodities have been selected and abandoned for use as money. Tobacco and a great variety of articles which I need not name have been used, but the evolution has been to select metals, and then among metals the lighter. Iron gave place to copper, copper to silver, and by that same rule silver must give place to gold. In the year 1896 I carried about with me a copper coin of Sweden of 1733 for $2. That coin weighed 4 pounds and 34 ounces. It was abandoned for the lighter metal, just as the farmer abandons the clumsy old wagon with the wooden hub for the more convenient and lighter vehicle. Bimetalism has also proven impossible with modern commercial progress. The concurrent use of two metals at a ratio of 16 to 1 or 15 to 1, or any other ratio, with modern development is impossible.

I will concede that for nearly two hundred years—from 1687 to 1874—these metals ran together at approximately the same ratio, with a maximum relative value for silver of 14.14 to 1 in 1760 and a minimum relative value of 16.25 to 1 in 1813. I will concede the very considerable influence which the use of a metal as money has in increasing its value; but conditions have radically changed. Among the factors which have caused the change are the following:

First. The larger proportion of the precious metals used for the arts and the larger transactions in gold and silver as independent commodities. Formerly the whole production of both gold and silver was eagerly sought for monetary use. This was particularly true of the first half of this century, when trade was increasing rapidly but the quantity of gold and silver was not.

Second. The larger use of metallic money for international exchanges and its lesser use for local circulation. A prominent use of metallic money is for the settling of balances between countries.

Paper money in a greater degree is used as a substitute in ordinary transactions. Then there is another influence—the great increase in the production of gold and silver in recent years, the increased production of gold beginning before that of silver. Formerly the annual product or even the product of a decade was an insignificant share of the accumulated stock, so that the production from year to year exercised but little influence upon the relative value of gold and silver.

This brings us to the consideration of the third fact named—the great increase in the production of gold in the last fifty years or more. According to the best estimates, the total quantity of gold mined from the discovery of America to and including 1890, a period of more than three hundred and fifty years, was $3,314,000,000. In the twenty-five years from 1851 to 1875, inclusive, the total quantity mined was $3,317,000,000, almost exactly the same amount.

We can confidently predict also that in the twenty-five years from 1876 to 1900, inclusive, the total production will exceed $3,500,000,000. This increase has made possible the adoption of the single standard. These comparative figures will be even more emphatic when we notice that the production of gold in 1898, $287,000,000 (Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1899, page 17), was more than one-half as much as for the whole of the sixteenth century; nearly one-half as much as for the seventeenth century, almost one-fourth as much as for the eighteenth century, and very nearly as much as for the first thirty years of the nineteenth century.

A pamphlet was published by Dr. Suess, of Vienna, about 1877, in which he maintained that the fields available for gold production were nearly exhausted and thereafter the supply of gold must decline. This pamphlet was republished as a Senate document and has afforded a basis for many of the arguments in favor of the remonetization of silver. His forecast has proven to be entirely wrong.

Improvements in engineering and machinery, and more especially in chemical processes, together with the discovery of new fields in South Africa and the northwesterly portion of this continent, have greatly increased the gold supply. A steady increase began in the year 1891. There is no present prospect that this added annual supply will be slackened, though it may be temporarily diminished by the present disturbances in South Africa. The prospect of an increase is so well established that it is safe to make calculations upon the present and prospective increase as a basis for action in coinage laws.

In the year 1898 the value of gold mined was more than the total value of both gold and silver mined in any year preceding the year 1891, valued at the coinage ratio of 16 to 1, and more than the total quantity of both metals, valued at the commercial ratio in any year preceding 1894, in which year the commercial value of both gold and silver mined was almost exactly equal to the gold mined in 1898.

Nothing but a marked decline in the production of gold would afford any justification for a reopening of this question of the coinage of silver as legal-tender money. Should such a situation arise, it will then be time for agitation in favor of a change of regulations.

One feature of the situation, it must be admitted, has given a great deal of justification for the arguments in favor of a larger use of silver as money—that is, the diminished quantity of gold mined from 1871 to 1890 as compared with the preceding twenty years. Had it not been for the increased quantity mined since 1891 the question would assume an entirely different aspect from that which it presents to-day. A charge of inconsistency can not be justly made against those who argued for the remonetization of silver during that period or until the increased production of gold became a settled fact, because existing conditions were radically different.

Notwithstanding the very general adoption of the gold standard by the more civilized nations during the last quarter of a century, silver has been coined on a very large scale. During the twenty-five years ending in 1897 the total quantity of silver money coined was $3,210,000,000. The total stock of silver money in existence at the expiration of the period named was $3,977,000,000. After making due allowance for recoinage it is evident that the greater share of the silver money now in existence has been coined since the demonetization act of 1873.

So it has not been an abandonment of the coinage of silver which has caused it to go down. It has rather been other forces more potent which we must recognize. How useless is it, then, to talk about being friendly to silver. Silver is a commodity; gold is a commodity. Each must take the value given to it in the markets of the world.

A great deal has been said in this discussion about basic or primary money. What is basic or primary money? It is money which as a commodity has intrinsic value equal to the amount that it carries on its face.

The silver dollar is not basic money. We have three kinds of money or currency in this country: First, gold money, which has intrinsic value; second, the credit or paper money, which has no intrinsic value; third, the silver money, partaking of the nature of each of the other kinds, which has intrinsic value to the extent of 45 cents and rests upon the credit of the Government to the extent of 55 cents.

Primary money is that which is not confined in its circulation to any special location, which does not depend upon the protecting influence of any Government, but that which, by reason of its intrinsic value, is available all over the globe in exchanges between countries. Under this test what is the comparison between gold and the silver dollar? The gold dollar, if I may personify it, comes to the mint and says, "Here I am. I need no stamp of king or emperor to give me value; I am worth 100 cents. Cast me into the crucible and melt me in the fiercest flame, and when I have gone through that process I am worth 100 cents." The silver dollar says, "Here I am; 45 cents. Put the dollar stamp upon me; put on me that sacred motto 'In God we trust,' and set me in circulation; and avoid that profane motto, 'The devil take the hindmost.'" [Laughter.]

I appeal to Democrats on this subject. The Democratic party in the days of Jefferson and Jackson was a hard-money party. In speaking of conditions in President Jackson's time Michel Chevalier, a French economist, who spent some years in this country, said:

Gold is called Jackson money. The national mint has been set to work with extraordinary activity to strike off gold pieces, half eagles and quarter eagles. The chief journals, in the interest of General Jackson's party, pay all their workmen with gold; the warm friends of Administration keep nothing but gold in their pockets; and whenever you see a man with coin in his pocket you may be sure he is a Jackson man. Lately the President went to his country house of Hermitage, in Tennessee; all along the road he expended nothing but gold; the Globe, his acknowledged organ, took especial care to let it be known to the public; and at a great banquet which the inhabitants of Nashville gave to him he drank as a toast, "Gold and silver, the only representatives of wealth recognized by the Constitution."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman from Ohio mean to say that General Jackson ever advocated in any manner a single gold standard or the demonetization of silver?

Mr. BURTON. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (continuing). What the gentleman really means, then, is that General Jackson advocated a legislative ratio which would insure the circulation of gold coin throughout the United States.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Is it not a fact that the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ingham, favored a single silver standard at that time in his reports?

Mr. BURTON. I think not.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. That is an absolute fact. A single silver standard was advocated by him.

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman from Texas may be right in regard to that. What I am now seeking to emphasize is the fact that President Jackson insisted upon money which had intrinsic value, and would tolerate no other.

One of the arguments most persistently urged in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver has been the quantitative theory of money, or the theory that prices rise and fall with the increase or decrease of the amount of money in circulation. A quotation has been made from Mr. John Stuart Mill in favor of this theory. On this subject I wish to quote another passage from Mr. Mill. He says:

The proposition respecting the dependence of general prices upon the quantity of money in circulation must be understood as applying only to a state of things in which money is the exclusive instrument of exchange, and actually passes from hand to hand at every purchase, credit in any of its shapes being unknown. When credit comes into play as a means of purchasing, distinct from money in hand, the connection between prices and the amount of the circulating medium is much less direct and intimate, and such connection as does exist no longer admits of so simple a mode of expression.

Mr. Tooke, the author of a standard work on prices, also says in this connection:

There is not, so far as I have been able to discover, any single commodity in the whole range of articles embraced in the most extensive list of prices the variations of which do not admit of being distinctly accounted for by circumstances peculiar to it. * * * Circumstances do frequently operate with such force as to reduce prices in the face of an expanding currency and to advance prices when the currency is diminishing. In point of fact, the expansion is frequently rather an effort than a cause of enhanced prices.

I read also from Adam Smith on the Wealth of Nations, wherein he uses this language:

Upon every account, therefore, the attention of government never was so unnecessarily employed as when directed to watch over the preservation or increase of the quantity of money in any country.

No complaint, however, is more common than that of a scarcity of money. Money, like wine, must always be scarce with those who have neither wherewithal to buy it nor credit to borrow it. Those who have either will seldom be in want either of the money or of the wine which they have occasion for. This complaint, however, of the scarcity of money is not always confined to improvident spendthrifts. It is sometimes general through a whole mercantile town and the country in its neighborhood. Overtrading is the common cause of it. Sober men whose projects have been disproportioned to their capitals are as likely to have neither wherewithal to buy money nor credit to borrow it as prodigals whose expense has been disproportioned to their revenue. Before their projects can be brought to bear their stock is gone and their credit with it. They run about everywhere to borrow money, and everybody tells them that they have none to lend.

What is the correct theory as to the circulation of money among nations? Every nation obtains that share of the world's money—that is, money which has intrinsic value—which its trade and wealth demand. The different nations of the earth in this respect have been compared to reservoirs connected by a system of pipes. If one nation has more than its share, the level lowers for the benefit of another. If any nation attempts to put money into circulation, paper money, fiat money, or that which is half fiat money and half actual money, beyond its share, what is the result?

Prices rise in that country and a period of inflation and speculation begins. Exports decrease and imports increase. They do not ship abroad as they did before, but they buy from abroad; and I wish to call attention to a fact that I should like to hear explained: If prosperity depends upon the quantity of money in circulation, why is it that in 1837, a year of panic, we had the largest volume of money and the largest volume per capita up to that time? Why is it that in 1857, another year of panic, we had the largest volume and, with the exception of one year, 1854, the largest amount per capita?

Why is it that again in 1873, the next year of panic, the quantity per capita was quite at the maximum? Why is it that in 1893 and prior thereto, when we had an abundant currency and were issuing silver certificates of an amount equal to the value of four and a half million ounces of silver a month, gold was being exported in enormous quantities? It was because we had a vicious currency system. Part of our metallic money had intrinsic value; part did not. The better form of money went abroad and the worse remained at home, a fruitful parent of speculation.

What is the explanation of the great increase of money since 1897? Not that more has been issued, but because of the change in the balance of trade and the impetus given to the commerce and industry of the country. This brought money at home into circulation and caused the import of large quantities of gold from abroad. Increased prosperity and confidence have been the moving factors to produce this result. If you had put the cart before the horse and issued a large volume of money, it would have been absorbed in speculative enterprises and withdrawn when those enterprises failed; but instead of that policy the Government has maintained the gold standard, and McKinley's election gave the assurance that it would be permanently maintained.

Then there came a revival of industry. It is useless to suppose that we can gain prosperity by opening up the mints to a debased coin or issuing paper money in larger quantities. We might be here all night with the best presses and issue millions of dollars of paper money, and yet the world would not be any wealthier than it was before; but if we were to use our skill in the manufacture of something that is useful, that met a demand, it would add something to the wealth of the world.

One thing is essential, not only to the prosperity of this country, but to its standing among nations. We can not remain out of line with these nations which have taken a stand for the single gold standard. Prior to 1896 nearly all advanced nations adopted it. Since then the drift has been entirely in the same direction. Russia, the most isolated of all the civilized countries, tried the experiment of a debased currency and failed, and recently adopted the gold standard. Peru, where the chief piled up the silver to the top of a room as his ransom, has abandoned the silver standard and adopted the gold standard. Far-off Japan, the most progressive of all the nations of the Orient, has adopted the gold standard.

Even Mexico, the country which would naturally longest adhere to the silver standard, has been compelled to recognize the current of events. It has funded its debt of more than a hundred millions of dollars, and what has it done? Though its mints have been at work for three centuries and a half and have coined over three billions of silver dollars, a large share of which has gone to the Orient, it has decided that those bonds shall be made payable in gold coin. Can all this occur without the necessity on our part of keeping abreast with the times and basing our currency upon a rock which shall stand? [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have two criticisms to make upon this bill. It would seem better to confine the issuing of notes of $5 and less to the silver certificates issued against silver in the Treasury and not allow the issuance by national banks of notes of a less denomination than $10. The total quantity of silver dollars represented by silver certificates of various denominations on the 30th of June last was, in round numbers, $406,000,000. The total quantity outstanding of notes of $5 or less was, of greenbacks, silver, bullion certificates, and silver approximately $302,000,000; of national bank notes, $74,000,000; in all, $376,000,000.

Everyone must realize that the problem in our monetary system will be to make use of the silver coinage in such a way as to prevent disturbance or an undue strain upon the gold reserve. From these figures it appears that the aggregate of notes of $5 and less, including national bank notes, is thirty millions less than the total quantity of silver certificates depending upon silver dollars. Why not restrict five-dollar notes absolutely to these silver certificates? There is every prospect that they would afford an ample supply of smaller bills, and at the same time would solve this perplexing problem of utilizing a large quantity of silver money not having full intrinsic value.

A second criticism: It would seem to be an improvement to provide more definitely that the national bank shall redeem their bills in gold. Each national bank must now provide a redemption fund of 5 per cent of its bank bills outstanding. Why not provide that this redemption fund shall be in gold and that at some central agency they shall redeem their bills, when presented, in gold? In case of a large demand upon the Treasury for gold in exchange for Government currency the pressure might be so great as to cause embarrassment. This embarrassment would be greatly relieved if the national banks share with the Treasury the burden of providing gold. Under present conditions it may not seem probable that this would occur, but our monetary system should provide for all possible contingencies.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, the argument on this bill is largely an argument after the fact. The people of the United States on the day of the last national election entered into their election booths, after hearing the arguments on both sides and reviewing the evidence, and returned the Republican party to power. By that verdict they pronounced against the clipping of coin by legislative enactment and in favor of a dollar true to name and true to the value stamped upon it, and that will not shrink on exposure to salt water in crossing the ocean. This bill simply enters judgment on the verdict of the people.

This bill declares that the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar. This is a legal declaration of a historic fact.

In the act of April 2, 1792, passed pursuant to Hamilton's report, in which he and Jefferson agreed, the word "unit" was employed as the equivalent of "dollar."

The value of this unit was to be measured both in gold and silver. The dollar was therefore neither exclusively a gold nor a silver dollar, but was a dollar into which gold might be made and a dollar into which silver might be made.

Gentlemen have talked through at least two campaigns about going back to the silver dollar of their ancestors and at times have worked themselves and their audiences into a state of feeling over the antique. But the dollar of their ancestors was no more silver than gold.

It was then, as now, a well-known law of coinage that with unlimited coinage of both metals at a fixed ratio the metal worth more at the mint than elsewhere would go to the mint and be coined, and the metal worth less at the mint than elsewhere would stay away. This is the so-called Gresham law, which takes its name from Thomas Gresham, once master of the mint under Queen Elizabeth.

It is perfectly apparent that I would be foolish to pay my debt of $10 in gold if with $5 in gold I can buy silver bullion, have it coined into $10, discharge my debt of $10, and have $5 in gold left.

Hence it is clear that silver under a mint ratio whereby it is given a value which it does not commercially possess will go to the mint and be coined and that gold will stay away.

Under such conditions it is clear that there can be no bimetalism, but only monometallism; that is, there can be no circulation of both metals as money side by side, but the cheaper metal will fill the channels of trade.

FORTY YEARS OF THEORY, BUT NO BIMETALLISM.

In April, 1790, Congress had referred certain matters relating to the establishment of a mint to Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, and in January, 1791, he submitted a report advocating the dollar as the unit and recommending the ratio of coinage at 15 to 1. In this report Jefferson, then Secretary of State, concurred.

Pursuant to such recommendation Congress passed the law of 1792, section 11 of which provided—

That the proportional value of gold to silver in all coins which shall by law be current as money within the United States shall be as 15 to 1.

In fixing this ratio it was intended to make the mint ratio conform to the then commercial ratio. It was not then supposed that by any mere paper enactment any single nation could compel silver and gold to go yoked in any arbitrary ratio.

However, soon after the passage of the act of 1792 silver became comparatively cheaper than gold, so that by 1800 1 pound of gold was worth in the market 16½ pounds of silver. Gold therefore became a commodity and was shipped abroad to pay for imported goods.

The comparative cheapness of silver stimulated its coinage, and it superseded gold as a circulating medium.

Nor did silver dollars remain long in circulation, but went to Mexico and the West Indies in exchange at par for Spanish dollars, which were about 3 grains heavier than our own. Their dollars were brought to our mints and recoined for reexchange for the 3 grains of profit involved until the further coinage of our silver dollars was stopped, May 1, 1806, by order of Thomas Jefferson, then President.

At that time there had been coined 1,439,457 silver dollars.

No more silver dollars were coined until 1836.

Under the ratio of 15 to 1 gold had gradually been expelled from circulation, and the coinage of silver having been prohibited under the order of Thomas Jefferson, worn, fractional Spanish money, supplemented by bank notes, furnished most of the circulation.

By 1830, as appears from a report of a committee of Congress appointed to consider the condition of the currency, the mint had coined since its establishment in 1794, in all, about $37,000,000, of which about four-fifths had been exported, leaving only seven or eight millions in the United States.

This was the net result of the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 15 to 1 for about forty years.

During that time there had never been bimetalism for a day, although theoretically it had been provided for.

THEORETICAL BIMETALLISM AGAIN A FAILURE.

By the acts of 1834 and 1837 Congress provided for the coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1, but again the legal ratio did not conform to the commercial ratio. This time gold was overvalued at the mint and went to the mint to be coined, while silver was attracted to Europe by a French ratio, which declared that it took only 15½ ounces of silver to be worth an ounce of gold, while the United States had declared that it took 16 ounces.

The acts of 1834 and 1837 in effect demonetized silver. This was done under the Administrations of Jackson and Van Buren.

Then, too, up to 1853, in the Administration of Mr. Pierce, silver subsidiary coin, viz, half dimes, dimes, quarters, and halves, which had theretofore been made proportional to the weight of the silver dollar and had been full legal tender, was reduced in bullion and limited as legal tender to the amount of $5.

This was because subsidiary silver was worth more than 16 to 1 and was rapidly finding its way from mint to melting pot.

From 1834 down to the Bland-Allison Act of 1878 the country was on a gold basis, without coinage on Government account, except during the period of our civil war, when we were on a green-back basis and cheap paper drove both silver and gold out of circulation and went down at times to 38 cents on a dollar.

During that period there was never bimetalism for a day, although theoretically it had been provided for, except that the subsidiary silver provided for by the law of 1853 did circulate with gold.

The gentlemen on the other side in advocating the ratio of 16 to 1 call themselves bimetalists, but they are not entitled to be so called. The only practical bimetalism in our financial history has been wrought out by the Republican party under a gold standard, and history makes it clear that the free coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1 would result only in a silver monometallism of fluctuating and reduced value, whereby a fluctuating half dollar would be called a dollar, whereby the purchasing power of a day's work would be reduced, the pensions of soldiers and widows would be cut in two, the value of existing life-insurance policies would be reduced to the injury of widows and orphans, whereby savings deposits and loan investments would be repaid in clipped dollars, and executors and administrators might file their final accounts and be discharged on payment of depreciated money and thereby legally defraud their wards and trust estates.

It is difficult to believe that any reading, thinking man can sincerely advocate the free coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1 as a means of obtaining bimetalism.

Indeed, sir, the theory that silver and gold would circulate together if free coined at 16 to 1 is only theory, with no historic precedent to sustain it, and which the mere wisdom and experience of the past have long ago refuted.

Since, under the operation of the Gresham law, silver drove gold out of circulation under the law of 1792; since gold drove silver out of circulation under the law of 1834; since cheap paper drove both gold and silver out, and since the so-called Gresham law is only common sense, which operates though not invoked, what possible assurance can gentlemen on the other side have that we would be exempt from its operation now?

HISTORY REPEATS ITSELF.

Shakespeare makes Jack Cade promise Dick the butcher, Best the tanner, Smith the weaver, and his other followers that seven half-penny loaves should be sold for a penny; that the three-hooped pot should have ten hoops; that all lands should be held in common; that the educated and wealthy should be degraded, poverty abolished, and that all lawyers should be killed.

Speaking of one William Lowndes, who lived in the reign of William III, Macaulay says:

He seriously believed, incredible as it may seem, that if the ounce of silver were divided into seven shillings instead of five, foreign nations would sell us wines and their silks for a smaller number of ounces.

He had a considerable following, composed partly of dull men who really believed what he told them and partly of shrewd men who were perfectly willing to be authorized to pay a hundred pounds with eighty.

Of our own condition in 1786 McMaster says that there were those who thought that a state could, by merely calling a bundle of old rags a hundred thousand pounds, really add £100,000 to the wealth of the community.

So there are men now who believe that our Government can by calling half a dollar a dollar add to our national wealth. It is singular how history repeats itself. There are still those who propose to make a half equal to a whole; to regulate value by legislation; to compel 7 half-penny loaves to be sold for a penny; that lands ought to be held in common, and that the man with a dollar ahead ought to be disciplined.

Every age renews the problem and every generation breeds its demagogues to operate upon the passions and prejudices of their contemporaries.

THE STANDARD.

This bill provides that the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the gold dollar.

The term "gold standard" has been much misunderstood and much misrepresented.

By it it is not intended to say that all money shall be made of gold, and it does not control the amount of money in use and circulation. This is one of the hallucinations, like that that 16 to 1 means bimetalism, which has been vociferously encouraged.

Nothing is absolutely fixed, settled, and determined; nothing is changeless.

The Pyramids are slowly crumbling.

But gold has become by common consent of the business world a standard of value because it fluctuates less than other metals.

The word "standard" means something definite, fixed, settled, and established. Obviously there can not be two standards, either of length, of weight, of value, or of any other thing.

By this bill, as by existing law, the gold dollar is the standard of value.

By this standard we buy and sell and borrow and loan, make contracts and make wills.

Around it all our complex business transactions, big and little, are carried on day by day.

It measures the market in which wheat, pork, stocks and bonds, and every commodity grown and produced are bought and sold.

If I enter into a contract to-day to pay you $1 or $1,000 one year from date or ten years from date, you want to know and I want to know that I am to repay you just what I promise to pay you; and with a fixed standard you know and I know; but if your standard bobs up and down from day to day like a cork on the wave, fluctuating in the markets of the world, subject to the caprice of public confidence, the element of chance enters into every transaction and trade is demoralized.

A safe standard is not only the unchanging measure of all transactions, but is the solid bottom on which business confidence is built.

If there is anything in our system of Government that ought to be built upon a sure foundation, it is our system of finance, especially now that we are increasing our territorial limits and including under the scope of our control more multifarious conditions.

Soon after the fall of Santiago Cuban merchants refused to take our silver dollars at their face value, insisting that they were worth only the silver composing them. They had not yet learned, perhaps, that the United States stands pledged to maintain its silver dollars at the value stamped upon them, or perhaps they had learned that there were those in the United States who were bending every energy to bring about a condition where these same dollars would be worth only the silver composing them and preferred to take no chances, just as the Philippine insurrectionists have learned that there is a party in this country who are seeking to cripple our Government in its efforts to restore order there and establish a stable government.

We are extending our power. The Nicaragua Canal will be dug. Hawaii, Guam, and the Philippines, strung together by a Pacific cable, will be stepping-stones for the advancement of American trade and American ideas and American liberty westward. Mr. Seward's prediction that the Pacific Ocean, its shores, its islands, and the vast region beyond will become the chief theater of events is rapidly being fulfilled.

Wherever our flag goes up, there our standard ought to be sure and steadfast.

CONFIDENCE MAKES BUSINESS—BUSINESS MAKES PROSPERITY.

Our financial system—

In the language of William McKinley—

needs some revision; our money is all good now, but its value must not further be threatened. It should all be put upon an enduring basis not subject to easy attack nor its stability to doubt or dispute.

Our financial system needs strengthening, not weakening.

When our credit is rendered doubtful our whole system is affected.

We have now a per capita circulation of over $26, but the per capita circulation is not the chief index of business.

Ninety per cent of the business of this country is done by checks, drafts, bills of exchange, and other instruments of credit.

It is only the smaller transactions in which cash is used.

Any uncertainty as to standard tends to contract the circulation of money; and money driven to cover by panic and hidden away in fear builds up no enterprises and furnishes no employment to labor.

He who establishes order and confidence multiplies money in circulation.

He who foment disorder produces a famine in money. Hence it will be remembered that in the period from 1893 to 1897 banks were unsuccessfully offering 4 and 5 per cent on deposits to lure money out of hiding, while under this Administration banks are burdened with deposits without interest.

One man takes another man's note because he believes in his honesty and ability to pay.

The people take a nation's bonds and notes because they believe in the nation's honesty and ability to pay and redeem them.

Honesty makes confidence, confidence makes business, and business makes prosperity.

Under a sound money policy we passed into a state of actual war with scarcely a ripple in financial circles; but no one at home or abroad would have been willing to lend to our Government with the knowledge that the loan would be repaid in 40-cent dollars.

The plain people the country over took our bonds and asked for more; some of them did more—they gave their sons; some of them did more—they gave their lives.

Every man who bought a bond testified his confidence in our Government, and no man who holds a bond will vote to have his Government repay him at 40 cents on the dollar.

On the 8th day of May, 1898, a resolution was introduced in this House appropriating $50,000,000 for national defense, and every man—North, South, East, and West, Republican, Democrat, and Populist—voted "aye;" but that appropriation would not have been impressive at 40 cents on the dollar.

Public confidence, on which the whole superstructure of commerce stands, would have been demoralized at the first approach of war, and disastrous panic would have followed where instead prevails national solvency and national pride.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN COINAGE ON GOVERNMENT AND PRIVATE ACCOUNT.

This bill provides that all bonds now or hereafter existing, all United States notes and Treasury notes of July 14, 1890, and all obligations, public and private, shall be payable in the gold coin defined therein and in conformity with the standard established therein.

There is a wide difference between this bill and the resolution of January, 1898, by which it was declared that all bonds of the United States are payable in silver dollars coined at the ratio of 16 to 1.

By that resolution it was proposed to take silver then standing temporarily at the ratio of 33 to 1 with gold, coin it into dollars arbitrarily and without limit at the ratio of 16 to 1, and pay debts with the money so created.

That was the so-called Teller resolution, and it was voted down at the ratio of 183 to 133.

There are at least two sides to every question—a right side and a wrong side—and as a rule the right people get on the right side and the wrong people get on the wrong side.

Our silver dollars are sustained at parity with gold by coinage on Government account because by coinage on Government account the Government may limit the output of silver dollars within its powers of redemption and because behind every dollar stands the promise and pledge of this great nation to maintain silver and gold at parity with each other at the present legal ratio or such ratio as may be provided by law.

For illustration, if I am the owner of 40 acres of land over and above debts, liabilities, and exemptions worth $2,000, my promissory notes up to $1,000 or $1,500 would be considered good because behind my notes would be property of the value of $2,000 liable to levy and sale; but if I increase my indebtedness my credit would begin to be scrutinized and my notes if taken at all would be taken at a discount.

To make the illustration more complete, suppose I should set up in my house a press capable of printing my promissory note at every turn of the wheel and allow everybody to turn the wheel and take my notes away, it is obvious that my notes could have no value beyond the material composing them.

The object of coining money is simply to certify the weight and fineness of the piece.

Individuals may not coin money, but if they might, and I might allow to be stamped at my house silver promises to pay instead of paper at every turn of the wheel and allow everybody to turn the wheel, it is equally obvious that my silver promises would be worth only the intrinsic value of the silver composing them.

If the policy of coinage on Government account were swept away and a policy of free and unlimited coinage on private account were inaugurated, the Government would be absolved from obligation to keep and maintain gold and silver at parity, and both metals would thereafter stand, rise, or fall according to their intrinsic bullion value. If your grocer should advertise to pay 25 cents a dozen for eggs, eggs being worth on the market 10 cents a dozen, eggs would be worth 25 cents a dozen in that vicinity so long as your grocer remained solvent and continued to pay the price.

So long as Mr. Leiter was able to pay $1.50 a bushel for wheat, wheat was worth $1.50 a bushel. But if your grocer should simply say: "Gentlemen, we have exceptional facilities for counting eggs; bring on your eggs and we will count them for you free of charge," this could have no possible effect on the value of eggs; or if Mr. Leiter had said: "Gentlemen, we have exceptional facilities for weighing wheat; bring on your wheat and we will weigh it for you free of charge," this could have had no effect on the value of wheat.

Under free and unlimited coinage the Government buys no eggs. It simply certifies that there are 12 in a dozen. It buys no wheat. It simply certifies that there are 60 pounds in a bushel.

It buys no bullion. It simply says to the owners of bullion: "Bring on your bullion, gentlemen, and we will stamp it into coin for you free of charge, and will certify that each dollar contains 412½ grains of standard silver, but we do not guarantee its value, and are under no obligations to maintain its value."

And when so stamped the coin would not belong to the Government, nor to you, nor to me, and we could not get a dollar of it without work or value received; but it would belong to the mining corporation or the man who brought the bullion to the mint.

The man or the corporation whose bullion had been so coined could then take his dollars so coined and pay off his past-due debts at 40 cents on the dollar, or whatever the bullion composing the silver coin was worth in the market, and could pay his laboring man at 40 cents on the dollar until they refuse to work longer unless their pay was raised as measured in such money.

But the laboring man could compel no one to receive these dollars at 100 cents in current trade.

The merchant would simply say, "This dollar is worth the bullion it contains—no more. For it we will give you 40 cents' worth of sugar, coffee, tea, or clothes."

Besides this the merchant would be obliged to charge something for holding in his till over night a coin of fluctuating value.

I am on record as having said, and I reaffirm the proposition, that a free, open mint is only a place run by the Government where bullion goes into the hopper bullion and comes out coin; and if a free, open mint can pull the price of silver up to parity with gold, then a free, open thrashing machine can raise the price of wheat, and a free, open sawmill can raise the price of basswood up to rosewood or mahogany.

If the touch of the Government stamp can create value, why waste silver and why coin at 16 to 1? Why not coin at 8 to 1 or 1 to 1, or why not stamp paper? Why longer permit poverty, since by mere act of Congress the distinction between the tramp and the millionaire can be obliterated?

The most iniquitous thing about the so-called free-silver contention is that it proposes that sovereign government shall take a metal of depreciated and fluctuating value, stamp it into money, and by its sovereign power make it legal tender for all debts, public and private, pay its own debts at 40 cents on the dollar, or whatever the bullion value of the metal may be, and make it legal for its citizens to do so. If any man should fail to do so under such law, he would be more honest than his government advised him to be.

Fortunately, sir, I have no fear that this proposition, so earnestly and so persistently advocated, will prevail either in Congress or at the polls.

In the language of William McKinley:

The United States has never repudiated a national obligation either to its creditors or to humanity. It will not now begin to do either. It never struck a blow, except for civilization, and it never struck its colors.

The bill further provides for the coinage of bullion purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, into subsidiary coins, takes off the fifty-million limit of the aggregate amount of subsidiary silver and fractional currency that may be coined, and provides for the cancellation of Treasury notes issued on the cost of such bullion. Thereby our subsidiary and fractional currency will be increased, and we shall be able in a measure to guard against loss on bullion purchased in a falling market under the law of 1890. It provides permanently for the recoinage of worn and uncurrent coins, so that our circulation shall suffer no loss thereby.

It provides for an increase of silver certificates of small denomination to meet the demands of a vastly increasing business.

Pursuant to the recommendations of four Presidents and five Secretaries of the Treasury, it amends existing law so as to permit the issue of bank certificates to the par value of the bonds deposited for their security.

THE END OF THE ENDLESS CHAIN.

It puts an end to the "endless chain." The resumption act of 1875 directed the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption of United States notes in "coin" on and after January 1, 1879, and for that purpose he was authorized to use any surplus in the Treasury and to sell bonds as provided in the re-funding act of 1890.

From the bonds sold pursuant to this authorization $96,000,000 were realized, since known as the "gold reserve." This reserve has not been authorized by law, but has been established by usage.

Such usage is legalized by this bill by a provision that a reserve of gold coin and bullion equal to one-fourth of outstanding United States notes and Treasury notes shall be transferred to the division of issue and redemption.

At present one statute requires the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem legal-tender notes in coin on presentation, and another requires him to pay them out again that they may return again for redemption again. This is the so-called "endless chain." This bill makes it impossible for any future syndicate to sell gold into our Treasury and pump it out again at will by providing that redeemed notes and certificates shall not be paid out again except in exchange for their equivalent in the coin in which they were redeemed.

This can result in no contraction of the currency, because while notes are being so held their equivalent in coin is in circulation.

Besides, the very fact that a run on the "gold reserve" is fully provided against will prevent such run.

It will be the old story over again of the man who did not want his money if he could have it, but if he could not have it he wanted it bad.

Such runs are not likely under a Republican Administration, but in time of prosperity and safety it is best to guard against contingencies.

THE USES OF DISCIPLINE.

In His inscrutable wisdom, the Omnipotent Ruler of the destinies of men and nations permits lapses and reactions in human history.

Prof. John Fiske has lately elaborated a cheering argument to the effect that the existence of evil in the world is so that man as a free moral agent may choose between good and evil; that if the world were wholly good, each man would be a good automaton, with no power or volition to select other than good, and therefore without merit for such selection; that, given the power of selection, he may at last present a character formed from buffeting with evil—rugged, worthy, and appreciative. [Applause.]

So nations, in the fullness of time, in the evolution of events, by experiment, by reverses, and by experience, evolve a national character.

On such hypothesis the office and functions of the opposition on the other side of this Chamber and that which it represents is explainable.

PROSPERITY.

We got down to the intrinsic bullion value of our national morality in the last election. We preserved our national self-respect and the respect of the world.

We have been successful ever since, and we have thereby demonstrated the truth of Washington's declaration in his Farewell Address, that honesty is the best policy for men and nations.

Our war bonds have been taken everywhere by our patriotic people, whose purchase is a pledge of their devotion to our common country.

The gentlemen on the other side urged free trade because they said the price was increased to the consumer by precisely the amount of the duty exacted, and things were too high.

In illogical conjunction with this demand, they urged free silver because they said more money would make higher prices, and prices were too low.

They sympathized with the laboring man because they said he was paying too much for his bread, and wept on the neck of the farmer because he was not getting enough for his wheat out of which the laboring man's bread was made.

They affirmed that wheat and silver were going down hill together, joint victims of the same inexorable law; then wheat went up and silver went down.

To certain minds it is evident that it is immaterial whether their major and their minor premises lead to a logical conclusion if their major premises make votes and their minor premises other votes.

They declared that there could be no prosperity which did not result from the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1; and here we are in the midst of an unprecedented prosperity, so great, so ample, so all pervading as to smother denial. Gentlemen, why put back the clock while the sun goes on.

Your talk about "bogus prosperity" is as worthless as the wind and rain tattered fragments of one of your last campaign posters. When gentlemen say they stand where they did three years ago, that tells the whole story so far as they are concerned. The country has moved on.

We are buying less and selling more than ever before.

We are conquering, winning, and annexing the markets of the world, and the more there is sold abroad the more there is made at home, and the more there is made at home the more labor employed at home, and the more labor employed at home the more wages paid at home.

And yet to certain minds prosperity is but a false pretense.

"ALL THINGS ARE YELLOW TO THE JAUNDICED EYE."

Crops may be large, but the more we raise the more trouble it is to harvest them; besides, is it not clear that there would be more if we could call a half bushel a bushel?

Prices may be large, but is it not evident that they would be larger if we could call 50 cents a dollar?

We are paying our debts, public and private, but we could pay them faster at 40 cents on the dollar.

Our whole condition is improved. Men are making money, and many men are getting rich, but some are poor, and is it not obvious that everybody ought to be prevented from getting a living in order that some may be prevented from getting rich?

Our export business is increasing enormously, but that brings no cheer, because is it not obvious that when we have traded all our products for gold, stocks, and bonds, we shall have nothing to eat but gold, stocks, and bonds and people will starve until they have only strength enough left to curse McKinley for restoring prosperity and then perish by millions?

And then while the earth swings carelessly through eternal space and "the sun climbs up and on and over," above the dumb despair of our prosperous destruction will be heard the growls of the trust monster crunching the bones of its emaciated victims.

To avert this awful cataclysm we are advised to vote for free trade because things are too high; to vote for free silver because things are too low; to come home from the Philippines; to give up the task Providence has set for us; to bring back our flag trailing in retreat from duty and proclaim ourselves forever incompetent.

This is a government of majorities, but if such things are done they will never be done by a Republican majority—never.

From the eminence which a century of growth, development, and expansion has builded the nation stands to-day with uplifted brow facing the dawn of a new century, whose years, let us hope, in God's providence, shall be shining steps in the upward march of the greatest nation on earth to grander and more glorious achievement. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is with a feeling of hesitation and somewhat of timidity that I will not endeavor to conceal that I rise at this time to speak for a moment only on the pending measure. I am not moved to this action by the egotistic belief that I can add anything to what has been said in support of this great measure by the Republican members on this side of the House.

I have marched under the banner of the single gold standard so long and championed that cause when it was despised and renounced by all political parties alike that I can not refrain from raising my voice for an instant in gratification in the hour of the triumph of that policy in this Hall.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] was on yesterday arraigning the members on this side of the House for what he chose to call their change of front and for fear they were not carrying out the wish of their constituents in voting for this bill. It will not be necessary for me to spend any of the few brief moments of my time in trying to square my record on the financial question. In the year of 1888, when I first spoke on the financial question, I said—and that speech was printed and given currency against me—that I believed the free coinage of silver was a delusion and a snare; a thing that had the sound of fabulous wealth, but in reality contained the essence of poverty; and that a double standard of value was as impossible as a double and different standard of length or a double and different standard of time. From that day to this I have never wavered or faltered in my belief, or the expression of it, upon this proposition.

And as to the second proposition, whether, in recording my vote in favor of the single gold standard, I will be reflecting the views of my constituents, I would say the gentleman need give himself no uneasiness upon that point, for the reason that the Republicans of the State of Washington wrote the word "gold" in the platform of that State long before it ever appeared in the Republican national platform. And when I was indorsed for the nomination for Congress and asked to express my views upon the declarations to be placed in the platform, I said:

I do not assume to speak for my party or my State at this time, nor to in any way foreshadow the declarations of my party on any subject. But if I were asked to write a platform for my party in this year of 1888—a year rich in glorious memories and heroic deeds—I would write away up at the top a ringing declaration in favor of sound money, and when I said sound money I would say gold standard, and say it without stuttering.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

And that is what we wrote in the platform, and then the good Republicans of my State, one and all, buckled on their armor and faced a hostile majority of 14,000 votes in a State that casts but 80,000 votes. Two years before the free-silver forces had carried it by almost 14,000 majority, and the Republicans of my State, assisted by many loyal Democrats, reversed that majority in 1898 and wrote 3,000 majority in favor of sound money and national honor. And when I cast my vote upon this question it will reflect the unbiased and intelligent sentiment of my State.

There would be no greater inconsistency to me in hearing a man talk of biyardism, biquartism, or bibushelism than to hear any one discourse on the beauties of bimetalism in the sense of using both metals as a standard. I admit that both metals can and will be used in common, and each will be a measure of value, but one metal only can or will ever be the standard at any one time.

Having come honestly to this conclusion, I have not been occupying my time, like the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], in looking about me to see whether I had reached a popular belief. The one feature of this question that has chiefly agitated my mind was not whether I had reached a popular conclusion, but whether I had reached a right conclusion.

Speaking for myself alone, I had rather go down to the bottomless ocean of irretrievable political disaster battling for an immortal principle than to ride into the haven of political safety under the flag of repudiation and at the expense of the honor of my country! [Applause.]

In 1892, under the Republican Administration of President Harrison, the American people were so busy making money that they did not have time to think. They voted a Democratic Administration into power, and then they had plenty of time to think! [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] They had little else to do during the next four years except to think; and while they were thinking and starving, and starving and thinking, they made up their minds that what they wanted was a high protective tariff and a sound-money circulation.

In 1892 they preached a crusade against all the industries of the land and whispered into the willing ear of the deluded voter that he was not really prosperous, but under the law which they proposed to give him he would be. In an unhappy hour for American labor they placed their trust in that party, and it tore down the barrier of protection, closed the workshop and the factory, threw American labor out of employment, and turned American men and women into the streets to wander, idle, hopeless, and hungry. By the enactment of that free-trade law they robbed the laborer of his employment on the one hand, and robbed the farmer and the producer of their customer on the other; and then, when they had reduced both to beggary by their false economic theories, they turned around in the next breath and told both that the trouble was not with the industrial system, but with the financial system. Told the American people that all at once they were being crushed by our financial system; the same financial system under which for twenty-three years immediately prior to that time the American people had enjoyed the greatest prosperity that ever blessed mankind from the day that Noah left the ark! I remember, and every member on this floor remembers, the pitiful condition of affairs in this country in 1894 and 1895—the condition that was everywhere apparent to the human eye. In fact, you did not have to see it; if you were similarly situated with me, you could feel it! [Laughter.]

In the year of 1896 the Democratic party found itself standing in the midst of a country with its industries paralyzed, its people hopeless and desperate. Did the Democratic party in that campaign attempt to justify the economic free-trade measure which had brought about this condition of affairs? It did not. It immediately turned its back upon all its promises of the past, refused to discuss the free-trade question, but immediately furnished the American voter with a brand-new soap bubble, filled with Nebraska wind, and asked them to chase that off over another financial and industrial precipice. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

We are surrounded in this country to-day by a prosperity that is as general and as genuine as the all-prevailing air, and gentlemen on the other side will make no serviceable political capital by endeavoring to make out that prosperity is not with us. The prosperity of the busy mill, the bustling factory, and the roaring forge are everywhere in evidence. What a contrast to the dark days of 1894 and 1895. One of the most eminent men it has been my fortune to know was a psychologist, a student of the human mind. That gentleman once said to me that one of the most difficult traits of the human mind to develop was that of remembrance. He said that first came idleness, then came poverty, then came want, then came starvation, then came despair, and then came remembrance. [Applause on the Republican side.] During the four long, long years that intervened between 1892 and 1896 the American people passed through all the different stages of that psychological proposition until they at last arrived at the stage of remembrance. [Laughter.] It will prove a difficult task for the gentlemen on the other side to figure out of American mind and memory the recollection of those dark days.

The gentleman from Missouri went far back into history in his remarks; in fact, beyond all recorded history into the gray dawn of the universe, when "the morning stars sang together." I wish at this time in my remarks to allude to a time greatly anterior to even that remote period. I wish at this time to go so far back into the misty past that no single Democrat on this floor has ever been able to recall the time. The period I allude to is the year of 1896 A. D. [Laughter.]

In the midst of your prophecies and predictions of to-day I wish to impress upon the American memory, with all the emphasis that this time and occasion will permit, that you also made prophecies and predictions in the year of 1896. Everything you at that time said was going to happen failed to happen. Everything you said would not happen did happen. Do you know what I would be doing if I stood in your place to-day? I would be keeping still. Yes, I would be keeping still in six different languages and praying to a just and merciful God that the American people might forget the promises and prophecies that I made two years ago. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

I desire now for a moment to refer to a little financial history. I presumed when I began listening to this debate that the gentlemen on the other side were attempting to make votes. Perhaps I am wrong in my impression on that point; but if I am right in that impression, I will now give you a life-sized opportunity to make one vote, and make it right now. There are a few points in this financial problem that I have never yet been able to get any gentlemen of your political faith to answer. My failure in that regard heretofore may be accounted for because I have lived away out in the boundless West, far from the throne of grace and the mighty reservoirs of distilled financial wisdom. But now, standing here in the midst of the brightest men of the silver party, I have a perfect right to ask that out of the accumulated store of your wisdom you shed a little light on one or two of the cloudy spots in my poor mind.

I desire to ask one question in regard to this famous theory of 16 to 1; and if there is any living human being on that side of the House within the sound of my voice who will give me an answer to this one question, and your answer when given is true, and likewise is consistent with your theory of free coinage at 16 to 1, I hereby promise, in the presence of this august assembly, to vote against the pending measure and for the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1. That is fair, isn't it?

In the first place, let me briefly recite a little financial history. The Republican party is contending that the ratio between silver and gold was merely a commercial problem and that the relative values of the metals was not and could not be regulated by law. The free-coinage advocates have always insisted that it was not a commercial problem, but was regulated by law, and that whenever we open our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1, this legal enactment will at once make the gold and silver dollars coined under that law of the same value; that each will be equal to the other in value because the law makes them so.

Well, we had the free coinage of gold and silver in this country all the time from 1792 until 1834—the absolute free coinage of both metals all the time at the fixed legal ratio of 15 parts of silver to 1 part of gold.

Now comes the question: If it is the law which regulates the value of these coins under a free-coinage system, what was it that caused the purchasing power of the gold dollar to rise above the purchasing power of the silver dollar between those two dates? What made them separate? [A long pause, but no reply.] My Democratic friends, you are now "up against the real thing!" [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Yes, Mr. Chairman, I have asked that question a number of times, and I have always received the same answer which I received just now! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I have always observed when I hear a Democrat discussing the free-coinage question he will start out at the beginning and move along down the line very logically until he gets right square up to the sticking point, and then he will spread his wings in the form of a beautiful oratorical metaphor and soar away up into the air and come down gracefully on the other side—and proceed! It has been the frequent observation of this peculiarity that has led me to try and get the organized Democracy of this country "up against the real thing."

I desire to press this question home upon the conscience and the intelligence of this House and the American people. If the law did not regulate the value of the two coins in the days when we had free coinage, what right has any man to say that the law will be powerful enough when reenacted to produce the result which it failed to produce when it was on the statute book before? That law was passed establishing the ratio at 15 to 1 when 15 to 1 was the commercial ratio. Then after the law was passed the purchasing power of the two coins separated; they separated not by reason of the law, but in spite of it. Some free-silver advocates may say that the two coins only separated in purchasing power about $\frac{1}{4}$ cents. They separated by exactly the amount represented by the difference in the bullion value of the two metals at that time.

Another beautiful and fallacious theory that I desire at this time to puncture is the statement that has been continually made on this floor and elsewhere, that under a free-coinage system if one of the coins rises in value a trifle above the other, that this difference in value will immediately transfer the demand to the cheaper coin, and this increased demand will immediately raise the value of the cheaper coin to a parity with the dearer. That is a beautiful theory, and it is frequently illustrated with a drawing showing two tanks of water joined by a connecting pipe which always insures an exact level of the water in both tanks. It is insisted that if the bulk of silver on the one side and the bulk of gold on the other are joined by a connecting pipe, to wit, a free-coinage law at a fixed ratio, this law will operate like the connecting pipe and keep the value of both metals at the exact relative value recognized by the legal ratio. It is all very well for the Democratic members of this House to stand up before the American people and tell them what is going to happen in the future, but what I want you to do is to explain to them here and now why the thing you say is going to happen under a free-coinage system in the future did not happen under a free-coinage system in the past.

I reiterate that for forty years under a free-coinage system of 15 to 1 the gold dollar was always above the value of the silver dollar. Where was that theoretical increased demand of yours that was going to raise the value of the cheaper coin? Why did it not operate and get in its work between the years of 1792 and 1834?

That law proved powerless to hold the two coins equal in value when their value was at an equality at the time the law was enacted. Yes, more than this, throughout forty years of our financial history that law failed to establish an equality of value between the two coins, and this at a time when the two coins were only separated in value by a cent and a quarter. Now, then, my free-coinage prophets, will you please tell me what ground you have for the belief that that same law which has proved powerless to raise one coin in value by a cent and a quarter in forty years is now going in a single day to establish an equality between the same two coins when they are separated in value by a difference of 53 cents? Why do you not answer that?

Mr. Chairman, as was said by a much wiser man than I in days gone by, "I have no lamp to guide my feet save that of experience." If I stand on the shore of a lake and throw 99 rocks in and they all sink, when I poise the hundredth rock to cast it out above the shimmering surface of that lake I have an established and well-grounded right to prophesy that that one is going to sink too. My Democratic friends, what right have you to prophesy that that one is going to float?

They tell us that they have faith that the equality of the two dollars will be thus established under free coinage at 16 to 1. Faith is a human attribute that I greatly admire and commend if it is founded on anything, but this particular kind of faith must be a sample of that faith which is said to have moved mountains.

I defy any member of this body, or any man on earth, to point out to me a single instance in the financial history of the world where any free-coinage coin ever floated at a purchasing power greater than the bullion value of the metal that was in it, or where the free-coinage privilege being given to it ever raised its bullion value or value as a coin after being minted.

And yet the free-coinage advocates on this floor are standing on the shore of time and looking backward into the six thousand years of the world's recorded financial history and are flying boldly into the very face of every financial fact and monetary precedent established during all that time by all the nations of the earth, and are to-day boldly affirming that the laws of finance, which are as universal as the laws of gravitation, are all going to be suspended and cease to operate because, forsooth, the Democratic party of the United States has written a financial falsehood in its platform. [Applause.]

In the discussion of the financial question many men insist in commencing the argument at the wrong end of the subject. It is business activity that creates and causes the circulation of money, and not the creation of money that causes business activity. And the men who begin the discussion of this question at the other end are simply arguing from effect back to cause, and not from cause forward to effect. And to that other class of financiers who are continually drawing comparisons between the amount of money in existence in this country and what they are pleased to term "the indebtedness of the country" I have to say that no light can be shed on the financial question by any such comparison. If A owes B $10, B owes C a similar amount, and C owes B a similar sum, one ten-dollar bill passed around the circuit will destroy the entire $30 of indebtedness, and—mirabile dictu—the ten-dollar bill will still be left, and it can continue to circulate and pay debts or buy commodities.

The exact function of a dollar is the point in this question which so many participants in this debate seem to continually overlook. When you pay a debt with a dollar, that destroys the debt; but the dollar is left. Like the old gourd at the spring around which I played in childhood—everyone who came along took a drink out of it; but they didn't eat the gourd. That continued to remain and served as the modest utensil that assisted in quenching the thirst of the thousands of weary pilgrims who followed that way. I claim that there can be no exact ratio fixed between either the amount of debts in a country and the amount of money in existence in that country; or the amount of business done in a country and the amount of money in existence in that country. If money exists in a country and is buried in the earth or driven into hiding by the just financial fears of mankind, that money for the time being performs no commercial function and does no man any good. It is the amount of money in circulation and the rapidity with which it circulates that is the index of any nation's prosperity.

The amount of money in existence in the United States to-day shows no great proportionate increase over the money in existence in the dark days of 1893, when we were cursed with a financial panic. The marked difference between these two periods of time is caused by the fact that the money of the United States, in response to a business revival and a just sense of financial security, has come forth from hiding, and is to-day filling to the brim all the varied channels of trade and industry. The nimble American dollar is to-day chasing itself around the circle of varied human employment, too lucrative to go abroad and too honest to go into hiding. [Applause.] That, in my humble judgment, is the most potential factor in American prosperity to-day.

One of the great war cries of the famous campaign of 1896 was that we needed an increased amount of money per capita. I heard that statement reiterated on every stump throughout that entire campaign; but, Mr. Chairman, the American people have come to understand from actual experience that they are not so much interested in the amount of money in this country per capita as they are interested in the amount of money per pocket! [Laughter and applause.]

In the campaign of 1896 I contended that the relative value of gold and silver and all other commodities was regulated by the universal law of supply and demand. I especially urged at that time, the price of grain being low, that this was the result of that law of supply and demand. This proposition of mine at that time was frantically and hysterically denied by every free-coinage advocate. They all said, in substance, that prices were no longer regulated by the law of supply and demand, but by the monopoly and control of the money of the world; and that it was impossible for prices to rise, because there was not money enough in existence to permit them to rise, and they never would rise until the volume of money was increased.

Just after they had thoroughly demonstrated to the American people the utter impossibility of the rise in the price of commodities without the free coinage of silver, many commodities, and particularly wheat, rose enormously. And immediately every free-silver claqueur on earth commenced to yell, "Famine in India!" "Shortage in Russia!" "Crop failure abroad!" and to say these were the reasons for the rise in the price of wheat.

Mr. Chairman, I know they are not right in this contention, because the shortage abroad and the crop failure elsewhere have to do with the law of supply and demand, and that is the very law the operation of which they were denying two years ago, and now you are very busy affirming what you denied two years ago! [Applause on the Republican side.]

The other day I met one of the gentlemen whose personality ornaments the other side of the House and he admitted to me in a mournful sort of way that one or two commodities had risen since the Republican party had gone into power. That is right, my friend; when the Republican party went into power several things rose; wheat rose, pork rose, beef rose, land rose, labor rose, humanity rose, the flag of the nation rose, everything from one end of this nation to the other rose except the Democratic party, and you bet your life that has been going downhill. [Laughter and applause.]

There is a great deal of difference, Mr. Chairman, between theory and fact. It is an easy thing to theorize, but it is a difficult thing to create. Any fool can prophesy, but it takes genius to create and brains to execute. I sometimes think the greatest party on earth to theorize is the Democratic party. I know that the Republican party is the greatest party witnessed in all history to produce results.

I recall one little incident that illustrates very aptly the exact difference between theory and fact. Out in my State there once resided a very eminent gentleman who was learned in the law and skilled in the sciences. During one of his vacations he made a voyage from Tacoma to San Francisco. When the ship passed out of sight of land the captain took the reckoning in order to correctly locate the ship on the chart. My friend was very much interested, and having studied geometry and higher mathematics, he asked the captain if on to-morrow he might be permitted to locate the ship; all of which the captain readily granted, and at the same time explained to him how it was done, to wit, by pointing one angle of the instrument at the sun, the other at the horizon, measuring the intervening angle, and taking the time of day, and from these given and ascertained points to figure out by a mathematical calculation the latitude and longitude, which point could then be located on the chart.

My friend was intensely interested. On the next day he got out the instrument and proceeded to locate the ship. He pointed one angle at the sun, the other at the horizon, measured the intervening angle, took the time of day, and then proceeded to figure it out. And when he finally ascertained the exact latitude and longitude of the ship he took his pencil and on the chart ran down one of the meridians and across one of the parallels to the point of intersection and then proudly remarked: "There she is, Cap; right there." Then he stopped to look at the point on the chart where he had located the ship, and, bless your innocent hearts, he had her located 700 miles in the middle of the mountains of Idaho. [Great laughter and applause.] And then he turned and looked all about him, and on every side, as far as the human eye could reach, he beheld the blue and beautiful waves of God's boundless ocean. That was the almighty and undeniable fact, that all the figuring and theorizing on earth could not refute. And you, my friends [turning to the Democratic side], theorized the people of the United States into a condition of opulence and plenty, but unimpeachable history has recorded the fact to be that you left them stranded on the financial rocks and commercial shoals 700 miles from the shore of prosperity. [Great applause.]

A number of the advocates of free coinage in this debate have said that their desire for free coinage was based upon a desire to "get back to the money of the Constitution." The first time I heard the expression "the money of the Constitution" used in connection with a free-silver argument I did not remember any provision in the Constitution in favor of free silver, and it occurred to me that possibly I had never read the Constitution. So I went home and took the document down, carefully blew the dust off of it, and proceeded to read it. And when I had finished I came to the conclusion that it was the other fellow who had not read the Constitution.

I hold in my hand now the Constitution of the United States. I deny that it provides for free coinage of silver at 16 to 1; I deny that it provides for the free coinage of silver; I deny that it provides for the coinage by the Government of silver at all in any way, shape, or manner. There are just two provisions of the Constitution that refer to the coining and issuance of money; no more. Section 8 of the United States Constitution provides that "Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof." That provision means that Congress shall have power to coin money and fix the relative value of different coins in accordance with the different bullion value contained in each. That clause of the Constitution does not mean that Congress has power to coin a copper wash boiler into twenty-dollar gold pieces.

The other provision of the Constitution regarding money, the one most frequently referred to, is section 9, the one immediately following. The clause of this section to which I refer reads as follows: "No State shall * * * make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." Every student of the Constitution knows that that instrument contains two great divisions. One portion of the Constitution defines and limits the powers and duties of the whole United States; the other division defines and limits the powers and duties of the separate States. The last provision, which says, "No State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts," is a provision that limits the powers of the separate States and does not define a duty of the General Government. And when the instrument says that the separate States shall not do a certain thing, this is not equivalent to saying that the Government shall do that particular thing. When the law forbids the doing of a certain thing on the one hand, it does not necessarily command the performance of the opposite of that thing on the other. For instance, the law of the land says that "no man shall have more than one wife." But it does not say that every man in the United States shall have a wife. [Laughter.]

If there was builded here to-day a bright and shining pyramid of silver dollars, whose base was as broad as the known earth and whose glittering top towered amidst the eternal stars, neither you nor I nor any other man could get a single dollar of it without giving up a dollar's worth of labor to get it. Then when they destroyed by false economic theories and hostile legislation the industries of the land, they robbed the American laboring man of the only avenue through which he could secure a single dollar. Then they immediately began to prate to him about relieving his distress by the coinage of more dollars—which he would have no opportunity to get.

In all this endless talk on the beauties of 16 to 1 I have as yet failed to hear a single statesman advance a single sound argument or detail a reasonable theory as to how this money is to be placed in circulation when it is once coined. Employment comes to a man first, and then money as a payment for that employment. The acquisition of money follows, but does not precede, the employment.

As I have witnessed the progress of this financial debate I have seen the advocates of the free and unlimited coinage of silver driven from one position to another until with common action they seem to have sought refuge behind and planted their case upon the enormous production of gold in this country in the last two years. Every time the statement is made that the economic and financial measures of the Republican party have been the potential causes of the now abundant prosperity it is a sufficient answer for them to aver that the production of gold is a matter not controlled by any party (which is true), and that this enormous production of gold in the past two years is alone responsible for the return of prosperity.

I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury which came to my desk only a few moments ago, which letter I now propose to read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1890.

SIR: Replying to your inquiry of even date, I herewith inclose you a table showing the total production of gold in the United States for the years 1891 to 1898, inclusive:

1891	$33,175,000
1892	33,000,000
1893	35,955,000
1894	39,500,000
1895	46,610,000
1896	53,088,000
1897	57,363,000
1898	64,463,000

Respectfully, yours,

LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

That table shows that there was an increase or decrease in the production of gold in the United States during those years, as follows:

In the year 1892, a decrease of	$175,000
In the year 1893, an increase of	2,825,000
In the year 1894, an increase of	3,545,000
In the year 1895, an increase of	7,110,000
In the year 1896, an increase of	8,478,000
In the year 1897, an increase of	4,273,000
In the year 1898, an increase of	7,100,000

Cast your eye on those figures, my Democratic friends, and then charge, if you can, that it was the great production of gold in 1897 and 1898 that brought prosperity to this country. There has been an increase in the production of gold in the United States during all the years enumerated above, but that production was not proportionately greater in the years of 1897 and 1898 than it was in 1895 and 1896, while the greatest increase in production made in any of these years was in the year 1895, when the panic was on and every business concern in the United States was embarrassed and every workingman in the nation was starving.

Now, the point upon which I desire information is this: If it is the greatly increasing production of gold in this country that has brought this change, and an increase in that production of $7,100,000 in the year 1898 has been sufficient to bring about all this marvelous change for the better that you say now exists, why did not the increase in that production in the year 1895, which was the greatest increase of any single year, to wit, $7,110,000, bring prosperity to this land in the year of our Lord 1895? [Applause.]

It will do very well for you to talk to the men from the East about the mighty production of gold in Alaska—and, by the way, I am glad to state on this floor that those reports have not been exaggerated—but I live in the city of Tacoma, on Puget Sound, the very gateway of the Alaskan country, and I know that months and months before the newspapers had even announced the marvelous discoveries of gold in Alaska and long before any of that gold had gone into circulation that Bradstreet's and Dun's commercial agencies had reported a wonderful advance in financial and business activity, and even the Democratic papers of the country generally had conceded that times were much improved.

I welcome to the American people, to all parties alike, without distinction, all the increased prosperity which may have been brought to them by the discovery of gold in Alaska, but as long as I am on this floor I am going to deny the right of the Democratic party to allege that prosperity, like a seer or a fortune teller, gazed into the unwritten future and ascertained that gold was going to be discovered in Alaska, and returned in anticipation of the event. Mr. Chairman, the discovery of gold in Alaska was an incident (a happy one, I admit), but it was an incident which accidentally followed the return of prosperity and was not a potential and controlling cause which preceded it.

The distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] who preceded me in this debate made a touching and appropriate reference to the message of cheer that went forth to the laboring men of this nation "from the little vine-clad porch at Canton."

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] has attempted to brush aside with a contemptuous sneer that sentiment which he could not meet in argument. Sneer about it all you will, my Democratic friend, the mighty and unassailable fact still remains recorded in 80,000,000 grateful and patriotic hearts that there did go forth from that "little vine-clad porch" to the waiting ears of the millions of his idle and helpless countrymen a message that was sweeter to their ears than the chimes of angelus. The American people to-day recognize their benefactor. It was he who put employment to their hands, bread into their mouths, hope into their hearts, and set the nation's flag forever in the sky. [Applause.]

I lived out in Nebraska a number of years ago, and I am acquainted with the gentleman whose name is breathed with so much reverence on the other side of the House—William Jennings Bryan. I know him. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I know him as well as if I had been through him with a lantern! [Loud laughter on the Republican side.] It has been my fortune to hear the gentleman on several occasions. In the campaign I now refer to I heard the gentleman make one speech on the financial question—and survived it. [Laughter.]

The gentleman was ornamenting the rear end of a freight train at that particular time. That was the campaign in which we had two men running for the Presidency, one of them running around over the country on the tail end of a freight train in a fruitless endeavor to find the American voters, and the other one sitting at home like a statesman and a patriot while the American voter was making a successful effort to find him. [Applause.]

The gentleman at that time, in discussing the financial question, said: "We are going to give you the free coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, because the gold dollar now buys too much. We are going to bring down the price of the gold dollar to the point where the silver dollar now is." And everybody threw up their hats. Then he walked over to the other side of the platform and said: "We are going to give you the free coinage of silver; and when we have the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1, that will lift the value of the silver dollar up to the point where the gold dollar now is." [Laughter.] And everybody threw up their hats again. [Renewed laughter on the Republican side.]

The same speech, Mr. Chairman, from the same platform and to the same audience. On the one side he told them that free coinage would drag down the value of the gold dollar to the value which the silver dollar then had, and on the other side he told them that free coinage would lift up the value of the silver dollar to the value which the gold dollar then possessed. And the truth of the whole matter is that the trouble with the immortal William Jennings Bryan, and with most of you gentlemen on the other side, is that in your arguments you are so crooked you can not walk around the block without meeting yourselves on the other side! [Prolonged laughter and applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] who has just concluded his remarks made a clever Republican stump speech, not entirely applicable, however, to the question under discussion, but apropos of the story he told I think I can say in this regard that if he took his political bearings at the present time he would find that he was "700 miles" and more out of his latitude. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, in discussing this bill I desire to protest with all the emphasis in my power against its hasty and precipitate consideration. The bill is being rushed through as a strict Republican party measure. The rights of the Democratic minority have been infringed. The fact is, this bill—a most important and momentous one—has never been referred to a committee of this House. It was carefully prepared last summer by a few Republicans, assisted, no doubt, by able representatives of the money power and the national banks. No one on this side of the House had an opportunity to see the bill, to consider it, or to discuss it before it was introduced, the first day of this session, by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET]. The unparliamentary procedure pursued by the Republican party in the consideration of this important legislation is in violation of all legislative rules and every precedent of a deliberative assembly. Under the rule adopted this bill can not be amended or perfected. It must pass just as it is, and passed within a week. Why this unseemly haste?

The Republican party has made this bill a party question. You made it a caucus measure, and under the spur of king caucus you hold your members in line to vote for it, and under the party lash you intend to pass it because you have the physical power to do so. For one, I am glad it is a Republican party bill, and that at last you have thrown off the mask of political hypocrisy on the financial question and stand before the people of this country in your true colors.

Many of the gentlemen on the other side, I am informed, never read this bill and never saw it until it was introduced, and I have no doubt that if you now expressed your honest opinions and your sincere convictions about it many of you would be against the bill, and instead of voting for it you would openly denounce the many vicious provisions it contains. Every one of you, however, must vote for it because it is a part of the programme and a part of the policy of the Republican party.

The leaders of your party demand its passage, and in order to prevent you from acting according to your convictions and for the best interests of your constituents they have made it a party measure and will pass it under the rule of the party caucus. For these reasons alone no Democrat should vote for it.

You are going to pass this bill, not because it is a good bill or a proper measure, but because the money power to-day behind the Republican party demands the enactment of this legislation. It is the final consummation of the contract made in the campaign of 1896 between Mark Hanna, representing the Republican party, and the national banks. It is the carrying into effect of the last and the most villainous act in the great political drama of the last national campaign. By this act the Republican party surrenders unconditionally to the sordid greed of the money power.

Mr. Chairman, I am absolutely opposed to the passage of this iniquitous bill and shall vote against it. It is one of the most vicious political measures ever attempted to be passed through Congress. The bill commits the Government unalterably by law to the single gold standard and makes all obligations, public and private, payable in gold. It strikes out the word "coin" in all Government bonds, which means gold or silver, inserts in its place the word "gold," and in addition thereto it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds ad infinitum whenever he pleases and makes the bonds payable in gold. The bill violates the obligations of the contract between the Government and the bondholder and provides that the finances of a mighty people shall be turned over to the national banks of the country and gives them the right at will to expand or contract the currency.

The bill does much more, but very briefly these are its most sweeping, vicious, and objectionable features. It is the most startling and the most daring departure from time-honored and well-fixed financial principles ever made in our history, and the result will be as disastrous as it is far-reaching. I say to you and to the Republican party that if this measure is enacted into law it reverses our financial system, repudiates the platforms of both parties, and revolutionizes the monetary methods of the whole country.

In order, sir, to show how the Republican party has changed its attitude on the financial question, let me quote the financial plank from the Republican national platform of 1888. It says:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

In the national Republican platform of 1892 you say:

The American people from tradition and interest favor bimetallicism, and the Republican party demands the use of gold and silver as money.

What a difference between the Republican party now and then!

And, again, in the national Republican platform of 1896 you say substantially that you favor free coinage by international agreement, which you pledge yourselves to promote. Let me ask if you are doing that now?

What a change from those professions to this treacherous act of perfidy!

Let us see how William McKinley, the Republican President of the United States, has progressed on the money question.

In 1878, as a member of Congress, he voted for the Stanley Matthews resolution in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 and declaring in favor of the payment of all bonds, principle and interest, in gold or silver at the option of the Government.

On the 24th of June, 1890, in a speech in this House, before William McKinley saw the light of the money power and experienced a change of heart, he said:

I am for the largest use of silver in the currency of the country. I would not dishonor it; I would give it equal credit and honor with gold. I would make no discrimination. I would utilize both metals as money and discredit neither. I want the double standard.

Why is he opposed to it now? Let him answer! The record speaks for itself, and on that record we appeal to the people for judgment from President McKinley in the White House, the agent of the money trust, to William McKinley, a candidate for reelection in the great contest next year. The people understand this question; they know what is going on; they will answer next year.

William McKinley in the last election did not stand on a gold-standard platform, but on a bimetallic platform to be brought about by international agreement. You promised the people to get rid of the gold standard. You then pretended to favor international bimetallicism. In that campaign the gold-standard candidate for the Presidency only polled about 134,000 votes. But now you throw off the disguise and declare unequivocally against bimetallicism, independently or by international agreement, and for the single gold standard. Up to the present time the Republican party and its leading thinkers and speakers have always been in favor of bimetallicism and against monometallism.

Against my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] I appeal to the RECORD, and I quote James A. Garfield, who said, in his inaugural address, March 4, 1881:

By the experience of commercial nations in all ages it has been found that gold and silver afford the only safe foundation for a monetary system.

Against my friend from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], who has charge of this bill, I quote that stalwart Republican, James G. Blaine, who said:

I believe gold and silver to be the money of the Constitution—indeed, the money of the American people anterior to the Constitution, which that great organic law recognized as quite independent of its own existence. No power was conferred on Congress to declare that either metal should not be money. Congress has, therefore, in my judgment, no power to demonetize silver any more than to demonetize gold; no more power to demonetize either than to demonetize both.—James G. Blaine in the Senate, February 7, 1878; Congressional Record, volume 7, part 1, page 830.

Against my friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], whose specious plea for the gold standard will deceive no impartial student of the facts, I quote from the great expounder of the Constitution, Daniel Webster, who said in the Senate December 21, 1836:

I am certainly of opinion, then, that gold and silver, at rates fixed by Congress, constitute the legal standard of value in this country, and that neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard, or to displace this.

Against my friend and colleague from New York [Mr. DRIGGS], whose speech I attentively listened to, I cite that sterling Democrat, Thomas A. Hendricks, who said:

That gold and silver are the real standard of value is a cherished Democratic sentiment, not now or hereafter to be abandoned.

And President Andrew Jackson, who said to the American people in his farewell address:

My humble efforts have not been spared during my administration of the Government to restore the constitutional currency of gold and silver; and something, I trust, has been done toward the accomplishment of this most desirable object.

And grand old Allen G. Thurman, who eloquently told the story in the Senate on the 6th day of February, 1878, when he said:

Has there ever been, so far as we know, a more prosperous country than were the United States from 1790 to 1861? Did any nation ever exceed the progress we made in population, wealth, education, refinement, and the general well-being of the people in those seventy-two years? And yet during all that period we had bimetalism, for we gave no preference to gold over silver or silver over gold.—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, volume 7, Part I, page 787.

And to all my Republican friends who must vote for this bill, no matter what they honestly think of it, listen while I read to you again from a speech of James G. Blaine, delivered in the Senate February 7, 1878:

I believe the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful, produce widespread disaster in the end throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole unit of value must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value, and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property.—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, volume 7, Part I, page 821.

Can anyone here get up and honestly deny that statement?

The position you gentlemen occupy on this question before the people of the country to-day is, indeed, an unenviable one. Why do you stultify yourselves? What has compelled you to go back on your record? What power, what influence, has compelled you to change front on this great question, affecting as it does all the people of the land? I will tell you. It is the money power, the bondholders and their agents, the trusts, the syndicates, and the plutocrats. They favor the passage of this bill. They are in favor of changing the terms of the contract so that they shall hold the option instead of the Government. They would commit treason against the Government in order to gain a monetary advantage.

The Republican party to-day is the mere agent of the money trust and in every department of the Government carries out its wishes and registers and records its decrees.

Mr. Chairman, let me say again what I have always said and which I strenuously maintain, that I am now, always have been, and always will be a sound-money Democrat. I stand to-day on the financial question just where I have always stood and just where I always expect to stand—for hard money, for gold and silver as the ultimate money of redemption, freely and independently coined at a ratio to be fixed and determined by Congress. I believe now, as I always have done, in the sound money of the Constitution, and I take my stand on the side of all the leading Democrats of our party from Thomas Jefferson, its illustrious founder, to Andrew Jackson, from Wright and Marcy, from Seymour and Tilden down to the present time. We stand, sir, where they stood—on the safe and the sound side—for bimetalism.

When we became members of this House we took a solemn oath to support and defend the Constitution, and everyone here knows that the fundamental law of the land provides for gold and silver, the money of the fathers and of all our glorious past.

I am an old-fashioned Democrat. I believe in the fundamental principles of the Democratic party. I believe in sticking to your party. I am no bolter. I stand squarely on the Chicago platform, and I have no apologies to offer for my support of William J. Bryan, or for my loyalty to the principles enunciated in that magnificent document. In my judgment it is the best platform the Democratic party ever adopted, and notwithstanding all you have said against it, I believe the day is not far distant when every principle enunciated in it will be enacted into law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I know that some of my colleagues from the State of New York differ with me on the financial question. I have no controversy with them except that of honest opinion. They claim the right to their convictions on this question as much as I claim the right to mine. I concede to them what I claim for myself, the right to hold and express my honest and sincere opinion on the greatest question to-day in American politics. They think I am mistaken; I think they are. It is an honest difference—that is all. Time will tell who is right. Let me say to my friend from New York [Mr. LEVY] that I am a Jeffersonian Democrat and stand to-day on the financial question just where Thomas Jefferson stood when he agreed with Alexander Hamilton and said "that the unit of value must stand on both metals." I know my friend favors the single gold standard, and he knows I favor the unit resting on the double standard of Jefferson and Hamilton. "There is no safety for the national finances," said that grand old Democrat, Thomas H. Benton, "but in the constitutional medium of gold and silver."

Sir, the history of all the past teaches in unmistakable terms that gold and silver at a fixed ratio was the basis for the currency of the world. I am neither a gold monometallist nor a silver monometallist. I am a bimetalist. I believe in both gold and silver, and I would not destroy or demonetize either. Both precious metals should be admitted to the mints of the country and freely coined, not for the Government, but for and on account of the depositor. Herein is the distinction and the substance of the whole matter. The act you do to-day will not destroy silver as a part of the money of the world, but will only be an additional incentive to every true friend of humanity to work harder and more earnestly for the free and unlimited coinage of both precious metals. There will be no sure, no lasting, and no permanent prosperity until it is done.

Make no mistake, gentlemen. The passage of this bill will not settle the controversy, but will only define more certainly the issue, make it more clear, and bring about more quickly its ultimate triumph. No great question is ever settled until it is settled right. Bimetalism, sir, is a living issue, and will be of paramount importance to mankind as long as civilization uses money for trade and commerce. Gold never was the friend of liberty. It never fought a battle for humanity. No people in a great crisis ever found it a faithful ally. It has been the agent of every panic, the minister of despair, the advocate of calamity, and the high priest of cruelty, misery, and woe. I am against the gold standard. If it comes by means of this bill, it will only come as a curse to rob us, to plague us, and to enslave us. In time it will have to go. The passage of this bill simplifies the fight.

But, Mr. Chairman, this bill does much more than firmly commit the Government by law to the single gold-standard policy of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. All our Government obligations are now payable in "coin," and the word "coin" is written in every bond. When these bonds were sold it was understood and agreed by law that they should be redeemed, at the option of the Government, in either gold or silver. This bill strikes out the word "coin" in all our bonded indebtedness and writes in its place the magic word "gold." It is well known and can not be denied that this will greatly enhance the value of all outstanding bonds and put millions and millions of dollars of unjust profit in the pockets of the bondholders. It is an admitted fact that if "gold" had originally been put in the bonds they would have brought a much higher price.

You remember the special message President Cleveland sent to this House in which he asked us to do this very thing. You refused—every one of you. The amount of bonds issued at that time, I believe, was only $62,400,000, and yet Mr. Cleveland said they would bring sixteen millions more if the word "gold" was substituted for "coin." You refused to do that at that time, but now you intend to write the word "gold" in all the bonds outstanding against the Government, and strike out the word "coin." You are going to change the terms of the contract in favor of the creditor and against the debtor; you make a new contract for the benefit of the bondholder.

You say you are in favor of honest money, but you know this is dishonest money. It is a fraudulent transaction in the interest of the bondholders against the people and an outrage on the taxpayers of the country. When you do this you make the debtor pay more than he agreed to pay when the debt was contracted. By virtue of law you make a gift—a dishonest gift—of millions and millions of dollars to the bondholders, foreign and domestic, of the Republic. I protest against this injustice. I cry out with all the vehemence of my nature against this outrage on the people. I am opposed to any law that robs the many for the benefit of the few, and especially so when it is done under the subtle cloak of national honor and the euphonious phraseology of "honest money." If you are in favor of "honest money," why do you do this dishonest thing?

We denounce your action and warn you that the people will never submit to such a surrender of their rights. We will pay the bondholders the same money they paid the Government for the bonds. No denunciation of the money power will deter us from doing our duty. As John Sherman once said:

The bondholder can only demand the kind of money he paid, as stipulated in the bond, and he is a repudiator and extortioner to demand more valuable money than he gave.

We stand by the terms of the contract. That is all the Democratic party wants to do, and it will resist with all its power any effort on the part of the Republican party to do anything contrary. On this question the Democratic party stands on the side of the people and demands absolute fair play for the debtor as well as exact justice for the creditor. The Republican party has taken its stand on the side of the money lender and the bondholder.

If your political policies were as honest as your professions, you would oppose the passage of this bill and refuse to commit this unpardonable crime on the toilers of this country. I am in favor of living up to the letter of our national obligations and maintaining them inviolate according to their spirit. I believe in carrying out the contract as it was made, doing no injustice to the bondholder, no injury to the taxpayer, favoring neither the creditor nor the debtor. The law of the land now is the act of 1878, and reads as follows:

That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States.

That is a Republican law, and William McKinley, then a member of Congress, voted for it.

Let me say to my colleagues from New York and to other members on this side of the House who believe in the single gold standard that in my judgment you violate no promise to your constituents expressed or implied if you vote against this iniquitous measure. The Republican party now tells us, and the President and the Secretary of the Treasury reiterate it, that the country is on the gold standard. If that is so, then why enact this bill? Is it because you fear defeat next year? Is it because you think William J. Bryan is going to be the next President of the United States and you want to tie his hands? Or is it because you want to surrender the Government now and for all future time to the money power?

If this bill did no more than simply enact the gold standard, I can understand how some of my colleagues who believe in that standard could support it, but it goes much further. It enacts legislation in many respects a thousand times worse, and that will, in my opinion, ultimately cause more woe, more poverty, more distress, and more misery than any other act in all our history. Every Democrat should be opposed to the sweeping banking privileges contained in this bill.

A Democratic Representative who favors the gold standard can honestly and I believe consistently vote against this bill without straining a conviction or violating an obligation to his constituents. Every Democrat should also vote against the bill because it gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue bonds without let or hindrance—a very dangerous power to delegate to one man. Congress should not abdicate its constitutional powers. We, the representatives of the people, should not lodge in the discretion of any man the right to mortgage future generations.

Remember, my gold-standard Democratic friends, the Republicans compel you to vote for this bill just as they have prepared it; gold standard, unlimited bonds, contracted currency, national-bank government, and all. If they were fair and honest about it, do you not think they would give you a chance to offer a substitute, or to at least amend it to meet your approval and to conform to the wishes of a great majority of your constituents? They do not need your votes. It is their bill—their party bill—and they will pass it no matter what you do. I believe the misguided Democrat who listens to the siren song of the money changers and votes for this bill will live to regret it.

My friends, one of the worst features, to my mind, of this bill is that part of it which consummates the alleged bargain made by MARK HANNA with the national bankers of Wall street during the campaign of 1896. They aided the Republicans then, and now they receive their share of the spoils. For three years the Republicans have waited and hesitated to pass this abomination, fearing the wrath of an outraged and indignant people. But another national campaign is near at hand. You need their help again, and in order to get it you abjectly and unconditionally surrender to the money power and turn the finances of a great Government over to the national banks. This bill delivers the goods bargained for. It is awful to contemplate, and the result can not be overestimated.

The powers this bill gives the national banks are far-reaching and most dangerous. It turns over to them the finances of the people—the lifeblood of trade and commerce—and gives them the right to contract or expand the currency at will. This right should never be surrendered by the Government. I say to you, and time will demonstrate it, that if you give the control of the money supply to the national banks they will soon absorb the wealth of the people and own the Government.

It is an enormous power; a power that can cause panic or prosperity, happiness or misery, to thousands and millions of people. I say it is too great a power to be given to any corporation, and if once given and set in motion for selfish ends and for sordid motives will be a fruitful source of woe and bankruptcy to hundreds and to thousands of our fellow-citizens. The audacity of this feature of the bill shows to what length the Republican party is now willing to go. Ten years ago this measure in my opinion would not receive 10 votes in this House.

Sir, you talk against trusts. This bill creates the greatest trust the world has ever seen—a national-bank trust, controlling the finances of a mighty people. Pass this measure, and the banks will be supreme. They will act in accord for a common purpose and be one great gigantic trust, octopus-like, with tentacles reaching all over and to every part of the land, holding, squeezing, and controlling every other trust, every other industry, and all the people. This bill marks a long stride in the gradual progress of the money power to enslave the industrial masses of the country.

If you enact this legislation, the banks will ere long own, control, and run the Government. It gives them the power to help or destroy, to make or to unmake. They can raise or lower the price of stocks and staple commodities whenever it is to their interest to do so. They can cause the stock market to go up or to go down and make for themselves or their beneficiaries fortunes out of helpless people and the unsuspecting public. They will have at their mercy the producers and the products of the land. They can boom stocks to the highest point, withdraw their support and send them tumbling down. They can mortgage every home, destroy competition, regulate prices, paralyze industry, stagnate commerce, and enslave toiling humanity.

In my opinion the secret motive for the passage of this bill is to confer these sweeping and unlimited powers on the national banks. It has been said that the national banking act is the greatest scheme ever invented by the ingenuity of man to rob his fellow-man. If that is not true now, this bill will make it so.

My friends on this side of the Chamber, I appeal to you in the name of justice, in the cause of humanity, and for the best interests of Democracy to vote against this iniquitous scheme of the Republican party. Every friend of the people, every sincere patriot should vote against this bill. Let us all stand together and present a united front to this assault of the money power to enslave the industrial masses.

To-day, in the face of what is going on, every earnest, every honest, and every loyal Democrat should stand firm against the encroachments, on the rights of the people, of the national banks. They menace our Republic to-day and jeopardize the perpetuity of our free institutions. They are against the people, and their powers should be curtailed instead of extended. Jackson waged the most bitter and relentless war of his life against the United States Bank and finally destroyed that gigantic monopoly. If he had not, it would have destroyed the Republic. One of the greatest acts of his life was the veto of the bill extending the charter of that bank trust. In the light of what is going on now that veto message should be read by every citizen in our land.

This is a Republican bill and the Republican party stands sponsor for it. If it should become a law, it would give the monopoly of issuing money to the national banks, and hence the right to expand or contract the currency of the people whenever it suited their convenience. No corporation should have this power to make or destroy. It would deprive the Government of one of its greatest attributes of sovereignty and give to the national banks the right to paralyze, at their own will, every industry in the country. It is the most daring attempt the banks have ever made by law to seize one of the greatest weapons for good or evil known to civilized man. For the Government to surrender this prerogative and delegate away this power would be a crime against every citizen in this land and work woe and misery to millions yet unborn.

I am opposed to the Government delegating away its powers to the national banks. The Democratic party should vigorously oppose conferring any additional powers on or granting any greater privileges to the national banks. In my judgment they already possess entirely too much power. They are doing precisely to-day, only to a greater extent, what the United States Bank did in the days of Andrew Jackson. The right to coin and issue money is one of the greatest prerogatives of the Republic and one of the highest attributes of its sovereignty. It should not be delegated, transferred, assigned, or set over to any national bank, to any trust, or to any monopoly. As Democrats we should resist the encroachments of national banks on the liberties of the people with the same zeal and the same courage that Andrew Jackson in his day resisted the audacious claims of the United States Bank. And when the national banks impudently declare that the Government should go out of the banking business, we should answer that the banks should and must go out of the governing business.

In Jackson's day there was only one Nick Biddle. To-day there is a Nick Biddle in every national bank in the land. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have ten minutes more.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that if that is done it will disarrange the entire programme on that side.

Mr. SULZER. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, if I remember rightly, challenged any man on this side of the Chamber to repeat a single statement made in a Democratic campaign speech of 1896 that was still true, other than the opening remark, "Ladies and gentlemen." As long as he leveled that challenge at the leaders only I did not feel that it was necessary for me to reply; but when the gentleman challenged the members of this side from the highest to the very lowest in the ranks, I felt that in the concluding words he had about gotten my range and that his shells were falling in my neighborhood.

I had the pleasure of reading the campaign speech of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, delivered in the city where I reside, in 1896, and it was a very good campaign speech from the Republican standpoint; and when I read it, Mr. Chairman, and saw that he claimed, as Republican orators always do, that every good thing that ever came to the United States came from the Republican party—that it was the Republican party that caused the rain to fall and the grass to grow; that it was under the beneficent influence of that party the sun shone and the grain brought forth a hundredfold—I said in my campaign speech the next day that I thought his was the boldest effort to traffic in the power of the Almighty since Simon, the sorcerer, tried to buy from St. Peter the gift of the Holy Ghost. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

After listening to the arguments of gentlemen on that side of the Chamber on the question now before us, I submit to the gentleman from Ohio that statement will bear the test of time. If I rightly understood the gentleman from Iowa this morning, when we have a big crop at home and there is famine abroad and we get good prices for the crop, it is the Republican party that gives both the crop and the price, but when we have a small crop and get a good price because of the reduced amount of the crop, then it is the Lord that cuts down the crop and the Republican party that puts up the price.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that sort of argument needs no refutation; nor do I care to go into any general discussion of the question of finance. I think there is some truth in the statement that the people of the country are not caring very much for financial discussion; not because they have less interest in the subject, but because they are fully informed upon it and have made up their minds how they are going to vote.

There are, however, some features of this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the House, because I believe it bears embodied in it a more serious menace to the business interests of this country than was ever contained in the wildest scheme of finance yet presented to the people. After establishing the gold standard and practically making every debt, public and private, payable in gold, you proceed then, in order to make the gold more valuable, to lock up in a public pound, created in a department of the Treasury, every vagrant dollar that dares trespass in any way on the sacred territory of the gold reserve.

I hardly think my good friend from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] is entirely frank in his statement of that proposition; for when pushed to the question as to whether this money so redeemed was to be reissued, except a gold dollar was substituted for it, if I rightly understood him, he said that the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion could exchange one fund for another; it could be transferred from the redemption fund to the fiscal fund and used in the discharge of Government expenses. I submit that the terms of the bill provide that the Secretary of the Treasury may exchange any money so redeemed for one purpose, and only one, and that is for the purpose of maintaining the gold reserve in the Treasury.

He can exchange this fund only as he can issue bonds and sell them; and if he can only exchange them in order to maintain the gold reserve, then I ask the gentleman from Indiana how and in what other way could he exchange them except by an exchange of greenbacks, Treasury notes, or silver certificates for the gold itself? I submit to you that under the terms of this measure whenever a dollar, however redeemed, has got into that division of issue and redemption, it never can go out again except a gold dollar comes into that pound, giving bond for the good behavior of that dollar so reissued. That is the fact. Now, what is the result of it? If this bill is enacted into law, we have a right to believe that the logical and natural consequences will follow.

Gentlemen say that money will not be redeemed; that no one will desire or attempt to redeem our present currency, whether it be silver certificates, Treasury notes, greenbacks, or silver dollars. If this bill is passed, the means by which they can be redeemed is furnished, the bankers get the power to compel redemption, and in the very same bill they are given a motive for the retirement and locking up of this money. You propose to substitute the national-bank currency for the currency now in existence, thus supplying the very strongest motive the national banks could have to lock up all other currency except their own, in order that their currency may be more valuable, and in order that no paper currency may be outstanding in the business world as a rival of their own.

How does it lie in your mouths, when you pass a measure proposing to lock up this currency and put into the hands of a powerful class both the right and the motive to lock it up—how does it lie in your mouths to say that that will not be done? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in the ordinary and usual course followed by these men we will find in a few years a larger part of the United States notes and the Treasury notes and the silver certificates and the silver dollars locked up in the division of issue and redemption, and what will we have to take their place? Let us see. I do not remember the figures of the gentleman from Indiana, but I have the figures taken from the last report of the Treasurer of the United States applicable to conditions existing June 30, 1899.

There were outstanding then something over $310,000,000 of United States notes, commonly known as greenbacks, $92,000,000 of Treasury notes, $401,000,000 of silver certificates, and about $80,000,000, as given by the gentleman from Indiana, of silver dollars. When this redemption takes place, we will have locked up over $875,000,000 of currency, for which you tell us there will be in circulation an equal amount of gold taking its place. How did we get that gold? By selling $875,000,000 of bonds, on which we are to pay every year more than $26,000,000 of interest in order to get money to substitute for what you admit is now the currency of the country, meeting all the business needs, providing every use and function of money.

But of course it will not be done at once. If it were possible to bring to the door of the Treasury every silver certificate, every silver dollar, every greenback, and every Treasury note to-morrow, and to exchange them for gold, and place in the hands of the men now holding them the equivalent in gold, there would be no security that within five years from this date 50 per cent of that amount of gold would still be within the territorial limits of the United States. Gold is the one money that is cosmopolitan. It is the one that has no local habitation, no fixed place of abode. We settle with Europe a trade balance in our favor, and the banks of the country are full of gold. We pay the trade balance, and our gold eagles are winging their way to other lands. England raises the price of exchange, Russia desires to fill her war chests, and the gold of the United States is promptly drawn out and flies across the ocean in every vessel.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] has said that there are no balances to be paid when the Republican party is in power. He has said that we export gold only when we pay trade balances abroad, but that the trade is always in our favor when the Republican party is in power. I hold here the review of the foreign commerce of the United States, as published by the Bureau of Statistics, and I notice that from 1866 to 1876, every year a Republican year, there was but one year in all that time when the balance of trade was in our favor.

I wish to call the gentleman's attention also to the figures on the question as to whether gold is only exported to pay balances of trade. I find that in 1876 the balance of trade was more than $79,000,000 in our favor, and we exported $23,000,000 of gold. I find in 1884 the balance of trade was $72,000,000 in our favor, and we exported $18,000,000 in gold. In 1886 the balance of trade was $44,000,000 in our favor, and we exported $22,000,000 in gold. In 1891, another good Republican year, the balance of trade was $39,000,000 in our favor, and we exported $68,000,000 of gold.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman state the importations of gold for those years?

Mr. COWHERD. I am stating the excess of exportation over importation. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Let me say that in 1896, a Democratic year, and I offer this to show that the questions of importation and exportation of gold, as well as the balance of trade, are not affected by a question of Democratic or Republican office holding.

In 1896 the balance of trade was $102,000,000 in our favor, and the excess of exportation over importation of gold was $78,000,000. So I say that if you could make this exchange to-morrow there would be no security that in five years from this date 50 per cent of the gold so paid out would remain within the territorial limits of the United States. But it will not be done that way. Every man knows the way in which it will be done is this: The banker wishes to pay a balance in London. The merchant wishes to pay for a bill of goods in Germany. The broker can sell gold to advantage in Europe. They come to the vaults of the Treasury with five, ten, or fifty million dollars of greenbacks, Treasury notes, of silver certificates, and the Treasurer takes the currency and pays them the gold.

The currency is locked up in the public pound, and the gold is promptly shipped to a foreign country. By that means the circulating medium of the United States is reduced by the amount of every dollar so exported and so exchanged, and this will go on year after year, just as necessity demands or just as exportation is profitable, until there is locked up in the vaults of the Treasury a large proportion of what is now the circulating medium of the country, and gold, instead of being out to take its place among the people, has been exported to pay foreign debts and balances. But gentlemen say that if we do not have the gold we will have instead of it a national banking currency.

I submit to you, gentlemen, that there is no security that you will have a national-bank currency under the provisions of this bill. Nor is there any justification for this great Government of the United States saying to the people it will surrender to any particular person or any combination of individuals or corporations the first and greatest power of a government and its most important function—the issuing and the coining of money. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Dangerous as it would be to surrender this great power to the banks, thus creating a money trust in addition to those now preying upon the people, and more powerful than all combined, yet even this would be less hurtful than the contraction your bill makes both possible and probable. For how under it can we be assured that even bank notes will be issued to take the place of the currency withdrawn? The bonds sold may never find their way into the hands of the banker.

When the bonds issued under the war revenue bill were sold it was the boast of the Administration that they had gone not into the hands of the national banker, but into the hands of the investor; that people of moderate means largely consumed the issue, and that the Government had so regulated its sale that they might go into such hands. If we should issue a half billion dollars in Government bonds, what is to prevent the great estates of the country taking at least half of that amount and holding them simply for the purpose of investment? But even should the bonds be bought by the banks, there is nothing to compel their use as a basis for the issuing of currency.

Bankers and brokers, like other men, will use the law, and legitimately use it, if the law is open to such use, to their advantage. If it rests in the hands of the holders of these bonds to contract the currency by their will, then what is to prevent them locking the bonds up in the vaults, secure in their investment and in the interest to be drawn on them, contracting the currency until ruin and disaster have swept over the business interests of the United States, and then bringing forth the bonds, issue currency upon them to the full face value, and with the money so issued buy for a song the property whose value was destroyed by the very contraction of the currency thus brought about?

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, this in the end would be the logical result and workings of the bill now before the House, and believing, as I said, that it is more dangerous to the commercial and business interests of the United States than the wildest scheme of finance ever devised or seriously offered to the American people, I shall surely vote against the measure.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the danger of permitting any coquetting with Republicans, and yet I will vote for this bill, provided you strike out all after the words "Be it enacted," etc., and substitute the words "the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to open at once the mints of this country to the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the existing ratio of 16 to 1," and then add a resolution to suppress the explosions of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and curtail the expansion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. [Applause.]

Taking them in reverse order, let me say that the eloquence of the gentleman from Iowa always rivets my attention and commands my admiration. I find much to commend in his gestures. [Applause and laughter.] He has expanded from the respectable white dollar, to be seen in every mart, to a disreputable mulatto standard, to coin which is a penitentiary offense. [Great laughter and applause.]

His eloquence on expansion reminds me of an old man in my town who was called on to explain "expansion." Mounting a goods box, he said: "This great Republican bird has plumed its wings and soared aloft and taken a view of this little world, and then lit, with one foot on the Asiatic shore, the other on the golden walls of California; has flopped its tail in the Arctic Ocean and pecked Filipinos off of the island of Luzon." [Laughter and uproarious applause.]

Mr. Chairman, a bird with such a stride must split somewhere or lose its footing on the one shore or the other. [Laughter and applause.] My genial friend, for I esteem him highly, is not certain "where he is at," has been, or whither he is going, and he answers queries like a man at the county court starting to leave.

He bridled his horse and put on the saddle. He put the saddle on hind part before. A bystander said, "Mister, you've got that saddle on wrong end foremost." He looked at the meddler and said to him, "How do you know, sir, which way I'm going." [Great laughter and continued applause.]

As for my friend from Ohio—I call him friend because he is so friendly in his disposition generally—he has again exploded, and he has deposited his explosive prosperity all over this country on 25-cent corn, 20-cent oats, and the farm products generally, and the other farming interests—a kind of nervous prosperity. He reminds me of a stammerer, who, seeing a man with a parrot, walked up to him and said: "Sa-a-y, m-is-is-te-ter, ca-ca-can tha-tha-tha that p-p-p-p-arrot taw-taw-tawk pros-pros prosperity?" "Well," says the man, "if he couldn't talk better than you I'd kill him." [Laughter and uproarious applause, long and continued.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, no one would suppose that we had a great financial measure before us, judging by the remarks of the two distinguished gentlemen, but that we were again in the campaign of 1896.

Before I have anything to say on the pending bill, let me remind them and this House of a few salient points respecting that great campaign.

The white people of this country are composed of the German, Swede, Irish, Jew, Italian, and Anglo-Saxon. They are Caucasian—all Americans. The Anglo-Saxon predominates, and this race in this country is increasing with more certainty and with more rapidity than any other race on earth.

It is not subject to the causes (or has not hitherto been) which check the growth of races elsewhere, such as war, famine, and pestilence. Its inventive genius has lessened the devastation and destruction of war. Commerce, reinforced by steam and electricity and our own natural resources, has made famine impossible, and medical science has minimized pestilence and disease.

We are the largest part of this great race, and in another century no people will rival the American people, if we but tempt not Providence too far.

This country is to be the great home of the white race, the principal seat of his power, the center of his life and influence. Our nation in what comprises wealth, viz, lands, mines, timber, horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, merchandise, railroads, etc., stands ahead of the world. Mulhall places our wealth at $82,000,000,000, the United Kingdom coming next with $59,000,000,000.

The English have grown great by attending to and interfering with the business of others, while we have outstripped her by attending to our own business.

Where does the intelligence, the cultivation, the genius, the industry, the integrity of character, the tenacity of purpose, and the bone and sinew reside? I say, in the white man of the United States.

You admit this, Mr. Chairman; and now, for the benefit of the statistician from Ohio, I desire to call his attention to the fact that William Jennings Bryan, whom he belittles, and whom the gentleman from Iowa ridicules, received just a little over 1,000,000 more of the votes of these great people than did William McKinley.

Yea, the Chicago platform received the approval of 1,000,000 more of these white citizens than did your St. Louis platform.

And I am slow to believe that the people of this country who think for themselves will run away with their sound judgment in the glamor of a little "cheap John" prosperity cry from the gentleman and join in the slogan of the other side of this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill and shall vote against it.

First. Because its banking feature is a delusion and a snare; one not demanded by the country, and one which was originated for the benefit of the few to the injury of the many.

Second. Because I believe the gold standard in this country is iniquitous, contrary to the Constitution of our country, and certain to curtail the circulating medium of the country and hence certain to bring misery and suffering to the masses of the laboring people, especially to the conservative farming element of this land.

I am not opposed to banks, sir. They are as necessary as railroads. They are beneficial to communities. They should be encouraged. A nation of enlightened and advanced ideas can not do without them. The limited time at my disposal does not admit of a lengthy discussion of this feature of the measure, and yet to do so briefly would be to leave it undone.

I may advert, however, to a few of the effects of the workings under this bill should it become a law unamended. It is proposed to make national banks the only source of issue. It might be well to recall the fact that the greatest bank that ever existed was the Bank of Venice, which lived for three hundred years and never issued a note. In making the national bank the only source of issue you not only deprive the Government of the sovereign right to issue money, but you destroy $346,000,000 of the legal-tender money familiarly known as the greenback and the $150,000,000

Treasury notes, all money which our people love. The Government surrenders its prerogative, which no sovereign can relinquish with safety.

Banks of discount and deposit are blessings to a community. Where are the thousands of State banks which to-day can not issue a note? Where are the thousands of bankers who can not issue a note? We are told that the note holder is made secure. True; but was not the holder of a greenback, of a Treasury note, of a silver certificate, of a silver dollar secure?

The national bank deposits a Government bond as security for the note holder. Is not the note of an individual banker as secure when a deposit is made for the security of the note holder of the individual banker; and if so, why should not an individual banker be entitled to $100,000 of currency if he deposits $100,000 United States bonds as an association of gentlemen when they deposit $100,000 United States bonds?

Indeed, sir, if a poor widow and a frugal farmer have each a $1,000 United States bond, and the one is pinched with poverty and wants money, and the other needs money with which to replenish his stock, why, tell me, should not both be permitted to deposit these bonds with the United States Treasury and receive currency—greenbacks, if you please—and be thus favored, as well as an association of business men?

His bonds are as good as the bonds of an association. The note holder of neither can lose.

And do not banking associations fail as often as individual bankers?

I notice that the Comptroller's report shows that since 1865 387 national banks alone have failed.

That is not quite 1 a month for thirty-four years, or 11 every twelve months during thirty-four years.

It is a well-known fact that no such number of private or individual bankers failed in the same period.

It is true that 17 of these 387 were found solvent and were permitted to resume business. The claims proved against the remaining 370 amounted to $127,002,895, an average of about $350,000 each, all of which, even if eventually paid in dividends—which was not the case—crippled individuals and associations, widows, and orphans irretrievably. But it was never all paid, for a deficiency of $44,000,000 existed; 236 of the 370 had been wound up, 134 still undergoing the process of being wound up.

So we are led to inquire, Is this great concession to associations in banking desirable? Do the existing institutions invite or invoke it? Will it inure to the benefit of their customers? Will it inure to their own benefit?

In the nature of things this bill must of necessity contract the circulating medium. Let us suppose that it is determined to start a national bank in a town, the capital stock to be $150,000. The whole circulating medium in the town is $150,000; $150,000 is paid in on the capital stock.

The bank proposes to issue $100,000 currency. By reason of the gold-standard enactment into law United States bonds have risen to 50 per cent premium. The bank pays $150,000 for United States bonds, deposits them with the Treasury, and gets $100,000 circulating notes. The circulating medium is reduced to $100,000, or 33½ per cent, in this little town by the operation. It has $100,000 national-bank notes, now its only circulation, whereas before it had $150,000. The stockholder, it is true, will get 4 per cent on its bonds, equal to $4,000, and say 6 per cent on its circulation, equal to $6,000, a total of $10,000, while 6 per cent on the $150,000 alone would have yielded only $9,000. But would this be a beneficence to the people of that community? is the question.

I remember well when United States bonds reached the point that circulation was so little profitable that banks with $1,000,000 capital issued only $45,000 currency, no more than a national bank of $100,000 issued. Now, we all remember that when President Cleveland issued his last, the $82,400,000, bonds, he sent a message to Congress requesting Congress to have the word "gold" inserted, stating that if this were done he could get $16,000,000 more for the issue, an increase of 25 per cent. Congress refused by a majority vote on both sides of this House. This bill proposes to insert the word "gold" in all past, present, and future United States bonds.

If the word "gold," inserted when Mr. Cleveland suggested it, would have increased the selling price of bonds 25 per cent, will not the passage of this bill have a like effect on all the bonds now unpaid?

If so, can banks afford either to purchase bonds at 25 per cent advance over present prices, or to hold those they have with 25 per cent dead capital, in order to issue currency even at the face value?

If banks find that they can not afford to issue circulation, of course they will not do so, and hence banks with over $150,000 capital will issue only $50,000, and banks under to an amount one-fourth of the amount of their capital, and we will have bank circulation to an amount of about $95,000,000, all told, a contraction which would of necessity bring to the point of failure many customers of the banks.

Do all banks demand this law? Let us see what other banking interests there are in this country and compare their standing:

There are 3,583 national banks in the country.

There are 6,349 other banks in the country.

United States bonds owned by national banks.....	$346, 114, 413
United States bonds owned by other banks.....	173, 973, 738
Other bonds owned by national banks.....	305, 428, 927
Other bonds owned by other banks.....	1, 353, 621, 422
Surplus and profits of national banks.....	342, 321, 752
Surplus and profits of other banks.....	418, 798, 087
Deposits of national banks.....	2, 522, 157, 509
Deposits of other banks.....	4, 246, 500, 832

National banks are banks of issue.

Other banks are banks of discount and deposit only.

But the system of taxation may be an inducement to banks to invoke the passage of the bill, for the Comptroller, as shown by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT], demonstrates that the burden of taxation will be less.

But however advocates of banking systems may want banks of issue, however profitable it may be, is it for the best interest of our people for the Government, to surrender to them that which is claimed to be a good and profitable thing for them, and yet deprive itself or the people of the same benefit?

If good for the corporation, then why not good for the Government?

The gentleman from Minnesota, to whom I always listen with great pleasure, a gentleman whose courtesy in debate is equaled only by the force with which he presents his views—I refer to the Hon. Mr. McCLEARY—said that credit was an easier method of settlement than cash; that the vehicle of credit was the note; that if he owed a man $100, what law, said he, should forbid him to give his note if the creditor would accept it?

So if two, three, or more owed a debt, who was there or what law ought to step in and forbid the three joining in a note and giving it? And so, analyzing further, he said the issue of a national bank was nothing but the association loaning its credit.

Now, I quote him from memory and while I have not his exact words I state in effect what he said.

I would like to ask him—but he is not in his seat—why, if your proposition is sound, and I believe it is, should not State banks be allowed to issue their notes, too, for the same reason given by you? You will not say because the United States must protect the citizens of a State from wild-cat money; you stultify your own proposition if you do. You know that State banks can and would be organized, with all the light before us, that would issue as good money as any national bank could issue. You know that the national-bank system is modeled after the banks of Louisiana as they existed before the war.

But you also know that were you to permit such an amendment to this bill that it would break the backbone of the gold trust and the agency of the monster would be powerless.

Banking ought to be free. No more impediment should be placed in its path than in the unobstructed course of the merchant, the artisan the professional man.

By one stroke of the pen after next Monday William McKinley will destroy not only the money of the Constitution, but the money made constitutionally a legal tender by the edict of the Supreme Court.

Talk of endless chain. There never can be a more complete one than the one forged by this bill. Even standard silver dollars are made redeemable in a standard the coinage of which is to-day under our laws a felony.

There is no gold dollar known to our laws of coinage.

That banks are a benefit to us no one can deny. That I make no war on them is my purpose not to conceal. That they should have every encouragement and that the law should be so framed that humble individuals in the smallest villages should have the mantle of such benefits thrown over them by the agency of their own people in such associations as they may deem proper, regulated by wholesome laws, I contend is right. But to organize a giant monopoly by the Government farming out its financial prerogative to a few giant institutions in a few of the large cities of this country is not only a dangerous experiment but one the exercise of whose power will shake the very foundation of our Republic. But even this power dwindles into insignificance when we contemplate the misery in store for the millions of our people when once the inexorable gold standard is fixed on us. No country in the world has ever had such a drastic measure as the one contained in this bill, and the only hope is that the people will rise up and demand its obliteration.

Who is to suffer from the gold standard? Is it right that the bonds of the United States, the debts of the people, should be by legislation increased in value 25 per cent at one fell swoop? Is it honest? Is it just? Can such things be?

Here lies old Thirty-three per cent.
The more he got the more he lent;
The more he lent the more he craved.
Good Lord, can such a soul be saved?

So it will be said of the Republican Congress of 1899-1900.

The honorable gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. McCLEARY], whose speech in reply to the Hon. Charles A. Towne in the Fifty-fourth Congress was an effort worthy of his high standing, and came nearer answering the incomparable argument of his great colleague than any speech on the Republican side in that splendid debate, is lacking, I think, in candor when he attempts to show that Thomas Jefferson was in favor of the gold standard because, as he claims, he stopped the coinage of the silver dollar.

He says not a single silver dollar was coined from 1805 to—his speech has not yet been put in print—a certain time, say 1834. I think I quote him correctly.

Now, to illustrate the want of frankness of the foremost advocate of the gold standard on the Republican side, I want to say that the Bible says "there is no God," and I announce a truth indisputable as far as it goes, just as his assertion is true, thus limited.

But how uncandid do I appear when called to task and I say I omitted the context and should have said, "The fool in his heart hath said, 'There is no God.'"

Now, I asked him was it not a fact that there never was a single gold dollar coined till 1849? He admitted this was true.

The inevitable inference from his assertion was that no legal-tender silver was issued from 1805 to 1834. The inevitable inference followed from my question was that no legal-tender gold was issued till 1849. Both statements left out, "The fool in his heart hath said," etc.

Now, what are the facts? That from 1805 up to 1853 all the silver coined was legal tender, but it did not happen to be in dollar pieces; and all the gold coined up to the same time was legal tender, but did not happen to be in dollar pieces. And up to 1873 as much legal-tender silver had been coined as legal-tender gold.

I deny that Jefferson stopped the coinage of legal-tender silver, and my friend knows that he did not.

But, Mr. Chairman, I pass on. Who are to be affected by this great wrong? We are living in an age of mortgages. Why should the plow and the hoe be emblems of poverty? My answer is mortgages. Why should the laboring man bow to the whim of the plutocrat? Because of mortgages. Why should the mechanic build the great edifice and live in a hut? He is mortgaged. Why should the artisan build the carriages and go afoot? He is mortgaged. Why should the miner delve in the mines and unearth the coal while his children shiver in the cold? He is mortgaged. Why should the machinist erect the electric light and go to bed with a kerosene lamp? He is mortgaged. Why should the builder construct the splendid organs and church edifices and go to an humble meeting house? He is mortgaged. The pick of the railroad laborer, the tools of the carpenter, the engine, the cars, the carriages, the horses, the farm, the cabin, and the huts are mortgaged. Will the gold standard help them? The palace and incomes of the princes only are free.

The latest statistics that I can find show, in the United States:

Number of farms mortgaged.....	4,747,078
Amount borrowed.....	$4,896,771,112
Number of acres so mortgaged.....	581,054,962
On lots, number of mortgages.....	4,770,669
Amount borrowed.....	$7,198,106,681
Number of lots so mortgaged.....	8,027,031
The total acreage of farm lands.....	623,218,619

This does not include railroad mortgages, as you will see, nor other semipublic mortgages, as I may term them.

These will no doubt double the mortgages referred to.

Now, while our friends are boasting of prosperity I wish to invite their attention to the fact that whatever there may be of it, it is all on borrowed money. For we are told that we have some $2,000,000,000 in circulating medium in this country. Even if true, which I neither believe nor admit, it is every dollar borrowed. Not only do we owe it as a nation, but wipe out all national, State, and corporation indebtedness, and we have standing against farm lands alone double the amount of the alleged circulating medium, and, including mortgages on other lands, five times the amount.

What does this mean? Does it not mean that the time is coming when the Klondike and our own mines will fail to supply our wants measured by gold? And does it not mean that our mountains, swelling almost to bursting with the white metal, must and will be utilized?

What if we have $400,000,000 more gold now than we had in 1896? What if this did produce prosperity?

Has not the Democratic party always contended for volume of money? Has it not always (and was not that its slogan in 1896) demanded more money? Has not the Republican party always claimed that there was a sufficiency and that low prices were an evidence of prosperity—an evidence of sound finance? And yet now do they not claim that more money has produced more prosperity?

What if $335,000,000 additional gold has produced some prosper-perity? Would not an addition in three years of $150,000,000 of silver dollars only have added to this prosperity?

The leaves of memory served to make a mournful rustling in the dark ways of Republican finance.

The Republican leaders, the great men in the ranks, have repudiated all such measures as this bill. Mr. McKinley did it when a member of Congress. He did it when he accepted the nomination on the St. Louis platform. He did it when he sent a commission to Europe to secure international agreement.

There must be awful memories as the light of bygone days flashed from the graves of your great men. "Take heed to yourselves, my Republican friends, that your hearts be not deceived and go turn aside and serve other gods and worship them."

In the language of Ezekiel, "I have given you up to the delusions of your own heart and justly left you to your own blindness that you shall not discern your own self-deceivings."

You are perpetrating a wrong on your country that is now without remedy. It will be corrected in time, and that in the no distant future.

But I am one whom you have not deceived. I began my service in Congress by sounding the danger signal, and I have kept it up without intermission; and now that this bill marks the climax of Republican treachery to the people of this country, I may feel at least some satisfaction in having attempted to avert this disaster.

In 1895 I published the following circular and sent it out to our people. Thousands of them were returned to me, and the signatures to them were numbered by thousands. And there is no surprise in my State at the exhibition of deception on the part of the Republican party as evidenced by this bill:

The undersigned, deprecating the combination of the money power of this country and England with the Republican party to enforce the single gold standard and to further contract the currency, believing that we voice the sentiments of the Democratic party of the great West and South, hereby declare:

- I. That we demand the free coinage of silver at the existing ratio of 16 to 1.
- II. We oppose the efforts of this combination—
 1. To retire the $347,000,000 legal-tender notes (greenbacks).
 2. To retire the $152,000,000 Treasury notes (issued under the Sherman bill).

3. To issue in their stead $500,000,000 gold interest-bearing bonds, as an additional and unnecessary burden on our already overburdened taxpayers, and especially iniquitous as against the best interests of the agricultural industry of our country.

4. To destroy the existing volume of silver money by restricting it to a mere subsidiary or token money, stripped of its legal-tender functions.

III. That this combination conceals its determination to contract the currency by retiring $500,000,000 greenbacks and Treasury notes, in which, if successful, then to retire the $400,000,000 silver dollars and to prevent any further increase of currency by a continuance of the 10 per cent tax on State banks, thus leaving the country with gold and national bank notes as "the money of the realm" and the only circulating media; and we believe that the success of such action will cause a further reduction in prices and wages, prove disastrous to our industrial interests, and precipitate another panic like of which this country has never experienced.

The currency or House bill No. 1 completes the crimes charged in this indictment. In 1895 I believed it was the purpose of the Republican party to do just what this bill provides; so I then predicted and so it is decreed.

No amendments will be permitted. It must go through just as a solid shot. Examine the bill. Compare it with this circular, and it will be seen that the bill provides, virtually in the language of this circular, that "gold and national bank notes are to be the only money of the realm," and that bonds are to be issued, principal and interest payable in gold! gold!! gold!!!

But again, is this country ready for contraction of the currency? Can even the Republicans stand this? We know that plutocrats are their masters and trusts are their protégés; that expansion is their allurements and imperialism their poem. But what of contraction? To take out of circulation $346,000,000 of greenbacks, money that all people want and that the Supreme Court said was good as the best; to retire the Treasury notes, $157,000,000; redeem the silver dollars, $500,000,000.

Is the country ready for this? They will recall that there were twenty Presidents, beginning with George Washington, down to Grover Cleveland, every one of whom was opposed to the single gold standard. They will recall that not a single illustrious man that this country has produced has advocated the single gold standard. There was not one of them who did not believe in bimetallism and the free coinage of gold and silver; not one who did not conform to our Constitution, which provides that Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof and that no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender.

Not one who did not believe that the "power to tax was the power to destroy," and hence opposed to discrimination in favor of gigantic trusts and corporations, of which the gold trust (now to be inaugurated in the beginning of the twentieth century) is the most gigantic and dangerous of all. Not one of them who was not the friend of him who follows the plow and hoes the hill, and ever endeavored to lift him up and not press him down.

You tell us of prosperity. Where is it? Do you find it in the humble home? Your eyes are fixed, not on the hut, but on the palace; not on the laboring man, but on the banker; not on the pinched and careworn face of the toiling mother, with her hungry children, but on the queens of society and the gifts of royalty.

A war was thrust upon us. Armies had to be fed; armies had to be transported and clothed. Speculation became rife. The great trusts took charge of William McKinley, body and soul, and of the Government. Idle labor was employed. Money hitherto locked up was turned loose. The great cotton fields of the South, the grain of the farmers of the West, the products of the fields were put in motion, and the agricultural exports brought in a golden harvest of trade balance—$385,000,000 added to our money. Spindles had to be started, furnaces went into blast, iron advanced. More money was the mainspring that started the wheels of industry. Then sporadic prosperity ensued.

Is it "fait accompli" for all time? God grant that it is. But must it be said that the cruel monster war accomplished that which thirty years of profound peace and abundant harvest failed to accomplish? Must we resort to war to produce prosperity when peaceable means are always within our grasp, if we use those means which a kind Providence has given us? God forbid. Must we measure the flow of human blood by dollars and cents? Are you prepared to be Anglicised? Is all this simply to be an ally of England? It tends that way, Mr. Chairman.

Is our great farming interest to be sacrificed to the greed of conquest? Where is England's boasted agricultural interest of 1800? Where the thrift of her farmer of 1816, when the gold standard was fastened partially on her people?

"Gone where the woodbine twineth," in the language of a New York banker.

With the Romans agriculture was the fundamental idea. A tract of land was allotted to each citizen. Senator Curias said:

I am not counted a good citizen, but rather a dangerous one to the State, because I can not content myself with 5 acres of land.

Cato, distinguished orator, general, and statesman, was loudly commended for having written a book on farming. The senate ordered the 28 books on agriculture of Mago to be translated into Latin for the use of the Roman farmers; and so in other nations of the world the farmers' interest was considered and protected, and yet in the Congress of the United States he is forgotten, neglected—aye, despised. The business man of the bank counter, the industrial head of the trust, is honored and worshiped. The superstructure must be erected, while the foundation is neglected. Can such an edifice stand? It is not the per capita of circulation that tells the tale of the needs of a nation, but it is the proportion of circulation to wealth. And we must note the distinction between wealth and money.

What matters it about circulation in a country barren of wealth? The per capita of $100 would matter little with no wealth to move. On the other hand, what matters wealth without an abundant medium of exchange?

We find from Mulhall that our wealth is $82,000,000,000. On this basis we have in this most progressive and the wealthiest of all nations $1 of circulation to $40 of wealth; in France, $20; in England, $15.

Now, let us suppose our circulation was distributed. Here is a farmer whose farm is worth $10,000. This is his wealth—his proportion of the $82,000,000,000. What would his proportion of the circulation be?

If $10 wealth gives $1 circulation, how much ought $10,000 be entitled to? Two hundred and fifty dollars to run a farm worth $10,000. He must make a start, and he must borrow. If the circulating medium was $1 for every $20 of wealth, he could borrow $500 with as much ease and at the same cost as he could $250 when wealth was 40 to 1. If the circulation was one dollar for every ten of wealth, he could borrow $1,000 as easily as he could $250 under existing conditions. Four billion dollars of circulation to-day would about put us on a par with France. If we had $5,000,000,000, we should be about on a par with England. And when we remember that our circulation is congested in the cities and manufacturing districts, how much more unjust to the farmer is our contraction of the currency.

If the bill goes into effect our circulating medium will be only $1 to every $80 of wealth, and the pinching will be renewed.

The people of this great country are to silently submit to such nefarious schemes to advance the interests of trusts, Mr. Chairman, and there is a death struggle going on. Trusts will conquer the people, and their manhood will be assassinated and their liberties will be gone, or the people will kill and conquer the trusts. Which will it be? It is for the intelligent, industrious, and courageous white American citizen to say at the ballot box. Which will they choose?

Why should we model after England? Why should we not, without waiting for precedent, not only command the gold but the silver of our country to do duty? We can pay with commodities every demand from foreign countries.

We have 70,000,000 people; 3,600,000 square miles of territory on which the sun never sets, for as it rises in Maine its golden rays are just dying out in the twilight of Alaska.

Our trade between the States is greater than the whole foreign trade of Great Britain. And this is free trade, too; and we need all the silver as well as gold of our own mines to continue our development and trade, yet in their infancy. Texas, at the one extreme, the largest of our States, an empire in itself, would make 212 States the size of Rhode Island, the smallest of our Commonwealths.

Rhode Island wants the single gold standard. Texas wants bimetallicism. In the Senate Rhode Island neutralizes the vote of this great empire of the South, within whose confines the New England borough might be lost beyond the hope of discovery.

The cotton of the South, the grain of the West, furnish the balance of trade that gives the trade balance, the gold, on which the alleged prosperity so generally diffused is based.

Yet these great producers of the South and West appeal in vain for the money guaranteed them by the Constitution, while New England and the trusts hold the conscience of the imperial power of a once free Republic and decree Gold! Gold!! Gold!!!

Every man, woman, and child in the world could settle in Texas and have each a lot 50 by 100 feet and not be crowded as much as New York City, and she can raise all the food products and cotton needed in the world.

We have about as many miles of railroads as the rest of the world combined, one of which alone transfers more tonnage annually than all the ships of England.

The tracks of our railroads, if laid parallel, would encircle the world seven times, and trains run over them every year traverse a distance four times the distance from our earth to the moon.

One-fourth of our area is still in virgin forests, and our annual cut of lumber, if measured in dollars, is more than all the gold, silver, coal, iron, copper, lead, and zinc mined in the United States, and yet we are ahead in mining. From 194,000 acres of coal lands we produce one-third of all the world's output.

The product of 1898 would have taken a bin to hold it which would have measured 10 feet by 45 from New York to San Francisco.

We have 75,000 to 80,000 post-offices—double that of any other nation—and of the 9,000,000,000 letters the United States mails carry one-half. Our farming interest is ahead of that of all nations; it is one-fifth of our national wealth, and yet stifled by financial legislation.

Our boast has been that the classes in other nations rule the masses; that in other nations the peasant is the slave of the landlord; the mechanic and laborer are the tools of the taskmaster; that both are shut out from aspirations. No future lies before them but dependence or want.

But that here—

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.

Take care, Mr. Chairman, lest this bill causes a revulsion to—

My country, 'tis of thee,
Land of plutocracy,
Of thee I moan.

The last words of Washington were, "It is well." Of Napoleon, "Tête d'armée."

The one dying in the light of liberty achieved for his people, beloved and honored, the first in the hearts of his countrymen, the exponent of a free and prosperous people and happy in the confidence of their giant strength and confident of that growth of power that was to astonish an admiring world and jealous of the glorious name of American.

The other on his lonely rock of St. Helena, sighing for his freedom; a caged lion, feared by friends and despised by foes.

A desolator desolate,
A victor overthrown;
The arbiter of others' fate
A suppliant for his own.

And like your party, Mr. Chairman, which this bill dooms to destruction, as the torch at Moscow doomed his brilliant career, he thought not of the millions of desolate homes, of sighing widows and weeping orphans, but only of the army, his instrument of power and tyranny; but dies recalling the fact that there was an element that had spoken and destroyed him.

But where is he, the modern, mightier far,
Who, born no king, made monarchs draw his car;

Whose game was empires, and whose stakes were thrones?
Whose table earth—whose dice were human bones?

But I have faith in the American people. I do not believe that they will indorse this measure. It may be that Providence, in its inscrutable wisdom has started the Republican party on this path that it may accomplish its own undoing, and in the language of Isaiah I would say as he said to the king:

Let not Hezekiah deceive you; for he shall not be able to deliver you.

[Applause.]

I present here as part of my remarks the admirable bill of the Hon. W. C. ADAMSON, of Georgia.

A bill to provide a uniform and stable currency for the United States of America.

Reit enacted, etc. That the lawful currency of the United States of America shall consist of such standard silver dollars as have been or may hereafter be coined, and such gold coins of any denomination as have been coined (since July 31, 1894), or may hereafter be coined at the mints of the United States; such fractional subsidiary coin of silver, nickel, or copper as has been emitted or may hereinafter be provided by law; such legal-tender United States notes, called greenbacks, as have been or may hereafter be issued; and the Treasury notes issued under the law of July 4, 1860, and coin certificates as hereinafter provided.

All of said forms of currency, except the subsidiary coin, shall be full and absolute legal tender for all debts and dues, public or private, without exception or reservation and regardless of contract, stipulations, or efforts to evade. Of the subsidiary currency the copper coin shall be legal tender at its nominal value to the amount of 25 cents, the nickel coin to the amount of 10 cents, and the silver to the amount of $10.

SEC. 2. That the standard of value shall be the dollar of silver and its multiple of gold (eagles or $10, half eagles or $5, and double eagles or $20) at the present legal ratio and of the weight and fineness now provided by law, which coins, and no others, shall be coined and issued from the mints of the United States for any persons who may deposit at the mints for coinage on private account either gold or silver bullion, all of which shall be received when offered in lots of not less than $100 in value, and coined without charge for mintage, the silver into dollars and the gold into their multiples, all of which coin shall have and bear such devices and inscriptions as are now provided by law for such coins, and the coins shall be delivered to the depositor of the bullion from which they were coined.

SEC. 3. That any person depositing at any mint either gold or silver bullion for coinage may, as soon as it can be assayed and its value ascertained, receive certificates of deposit for so many dollars of coin as the bullion would make when coined. For this purpose there shall be kept at the mint a supply of coin certificates furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury. When the bullion for which certificates are issued is coined, the coin shall be covered into the Treasury. Any person depositing at the Treasury any number of dollars of either gold or silver coin in amounts exceeding $1 shall receive from the Treasurer like coin certificates for as many dollars as are deposited. There shall never be issued a certificate for gold or silver as such, but all of such coin certificates used at the mints and the Treasury shall be of the same form and expressly for coin, and shall be redeemable in coin on demand at the Treasury when presented in sums not less than $100.

SEC. 4. That the fractional subsidiary coin now authorized by law shall be manufactured on Government account from bullion and metal purchased at its market price, paid for with legal-tender coin or Treasury notes. The amount of fractional currency shall be increased until $200,000,000 shall have been emitted, up to which amount it shall be kept in circulation among the people by using it to the amount of its legal-tender limit in every payment and disbursement made by the Government; which fractional currency may at any time be exchanged at the Treasury, in sums not less than $100, for legal-tender coin or Treasury notes.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare and issue in denominations of $5 and multiples thereof legal-tender Treasury notes of the United States, commonly called greenbacks, which, like those heretofore issued, shall be convertible on demand at the Treasury into legal-tender coin, and shall keep such Treasury notes in circulation to the amount, including those now in circulation, of $500,000,000 by paying them out upon all dues and disbursements of the Government. No more than $500,000,000 of such Treasury notes shall be in circulation at one time, and whenever the amount outstanding is below that sum they shall be paid out in all disbursements by the Treasurer.

SEC. 6. That all obligations of the United States, whether bonds, Treasury notes, or coin certificates, when presented for payment shall, as now provided by law for all existing liabilities except gold certificates, be payable at the option of the Government in any legal-tender coin in the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall so exercise that option as to pay out the coin of that metal which is more plentiful in the Treasury and more easy and likely to flow in and remain plentiful.

SEC. 7. That section 3412 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, edition of 1878, is hereby repealed, and it shall not hereafter be lawful for the Government in any wise to participate in, control, or assume responsibility for the issue or redemption of circulating notes of any bank; nor shall any bank of issue, State or Federal, be required to pay any tax to the United States Government upon notes issued and paid out, whether its own or those of other banks.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, as rapidly as possible, cause to be coined at the mints of the United States into standard silver dollars all the silver bullion in his custody, both corpus and seigniorage, cover the coined dollars into the Treasury, and to pay them out when coin is needed to redeem any paper of the Government payable in coin.

SEC. 9. That it having been heretofore "declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money," and "to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, to be secured through international agreement or safeguards of legislation," and that "the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetalism," the Congress now redeems those pledges by this enactment, which provides all the safeguards of legislation necessary to secure the desired end. All other nations which desire to do so are at liberty to adopt the same system, with the assurance that fluctuation in the values of the two metals can not be prevented by discriminating legislation against either, but that permanent stability can be assured only by according the two metals the same legislative consideration and reestablishing that equality of condition which allows the people, in making their payments, the unrestricted use of either or both. To this righteous and honest course the United States of America will adhere in future, regardless of the machinations of speculators or the policies of other nations.

SEC. 10. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act or any part thereof are hereby repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, before I touch upon the merits of this bill, I feel it my duty, having been a member of the Fifty-fifth Congress, to give to the members, especially the new members, of this House and the people who are to suffer by it, some of the history of this proposed legislation in the Fifty-fifth Congress. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that in 1897 we were called here in extra session a few days after we were elected, about March the 15th, and that the Speaker of this Republican House refused to appoint any committees except those he wanted, the Committee on Rules and the Committee on Ways and Means. You will remember further that all through this session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, though it sat here from the 15th of March until the last of July, all it did was to pass the unfortunate Dingley bill, which perpetuated a deficit in the Treasury which had been inherited from the bond-producing McKinley bill under the Administration of President Harrison.

You will remember that from day to day, after the passage of that bill in this House, the Democratic party urged the Republican majority and the Speaker of this House to appoint the committees in order that we might proceed in due course to the investigation of the important questions proposed for legislation by both Democrats and Republicans. The Speaker was upheld in his reckless and revolutionary assumption of power. No other business was permitted. The House met daily only to adjourn, and then, growing tired of this useless frivolity, the Republicans adjourned it for four days at a time, which was unquestionably in contravention of the Constitution, as was then abundantly shown. At last the President ended this unprecedented folly by sending in, just ninety minutes before the hour for final adjournment, a message recommending the passage of a currency bill, and it was immediately passed without having been referred to any committee and without the slightest deliberation or discussion. I have before me that message. He recommended for passage the Indianapolis gold-standard bill, designed to rivet more permanently upon the statute books the gold standard, and that too while the Wolcott monetary commission was in Europe, at the President's instance, trying to induce other nations to help us drop the gold standard. The President said:

A notable assembly of business men, with delegates from 29 States and Territories, was held at Indianapolis in January of this year. The financial situation commanded their earnest attention, and after two days' session the convention recommended to Congress the appointment of a monetary commission. I commend this report to the consideration of Congress.

The report, thus indorsed and commended by the President, said in part:

This conference declares that it has become necessary that a consistent, straightforward, and deliberately planned monetary system shall be inaugurated, the fundamental basis of which shall be, first, that the present gold standard should be maintained.

Notwithstanding this measure involved the determination of an issue of most transcendent importance, the President advised Congress to give it no thought or consideration, well knowing that within the few minutes left to it before adjournment it could not do so, urging its immediate passage thus:

This subject should receive the attention of Congress at this special session. It ought not to be postponed until the regular session.

If the President was working in good faith for international bimetalism, he should never have sent, as long as he was so laboring, this message to Congress. Not content with that, he appealed for immediate legislation thereon. It must seem to any fair-minded man that it is a plain case of duplicity and bad faith on the part of the President.

In addition to this, he appointed Mr. Gage, an ultra gold monometallist, Secretary of the Treasury, who indorsed personally and officially the gold plans of the Indianapolis convention, which in turn were indorsed and recommended by the President, as I have shown, to Congress for immediate action. Here was a complete surrender by the President to Mr. Gage's gold monometallic plans, and very naturally it destroyed all practical hopes of success of the Wolcott International Bimetallic Commission then at work in Europe. We are not surprised that Senator WOLCOTT in his speech in the Senate took to task Mr. Secretary Gage, and I shall expect him now to be equally as painstaking in condemning the President for following in the steps of Mr. Gage in urging the passage of the bill we are now considering. Senator WOLCOTT said in the Senate:

Here, Mr. President, I should naturally end this account of our negotiations, negotiations which are still pending and undetermined. The extraordinary statements, however, lately made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and which, unexplained, must seriously affect the future of any further attempts toward securing international action, require some reference at this time.

When Congress convened on the 6th of last month the President, in his reference to the subject of international bimetalism, spoke earnestly and anxiously of his desire to see an international bimetallic agreement consummated. His assurances gave renewed hope to bimetalists all over the country, and seemed final and conclusive answer to those who had claimed that the President was not in earnest in his efforts toward international bimetalism. For myself, I needed no such proof. I had again and again been made to know how genuine was the President's devotion to this settlement of the vexed question. Within a fortnight after this, with no event meanwhile which would change existing conditions, the Secretary of the Treasury, in support of a bill which he has prepared respecting the currency, said as follows to a committee of Congress:

"The objects I have in mind in the series of provisions offered by me are four in number:

"1. To commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard, remove, so far as possible, all doubts and fears on that point, and thus strengthen the credit of the United States both at home and abroad."

The two statements are utterly at variance and contradictory to each other. They can not be reconciled. This is not the proper occasion to analyze the bill of the Secretary. It will reach limbo long before it reaches the Senate. He proposes to capitalize the premium on our bonds sold recently and to make of them, with others to be issued, a security definitely payable in gold.

The Secretary forgets that only a few months ago, when the country was in dire distress, we were compelled to pay $9,000,000 for the privilege of keeping the word "gold" out of some of these very bonds. He ought not to forget, for the bank of which he was president, it was said, got some of the bonds and received some of the proceeds of that deplorable transaction. But I do not intend to discuss the bill which the President's message specifically does not endorse, and it is premature to criticize the Secretary's Republicanism, for his advent into the party and the Cabinet were practically contemporaneous. We must accept the situation.

In my opinion, the great majority of the members of the Republican party are bimetallicists, and the fact that they are misrepresented by a Cabinet officer is not pleasing, but it is endurable. The selection of the members of his official household is the President's own affair, and so long as he stands upon the question of bimetallicism where he has ever stood there is no serious ground for apprehension. But even in the inconceivable event that the Chief Magistrate of this people should, in the exercise of his judgment, determine to countenance the final fastening upon this country of the burdens of the gold standard, I trust we may still warrant for faith and hope in the pledges of the party and the wisdom of its counsels.

We will cross our bridges when we come to them. The time when this country will submit to the final imposition of gold monometallism is far away. Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the ability of this country to maintain alone the parity between silver and gold, there is no question that the concurrence of other nations would help and not hinder the cause of bimetallicism in the United States, and efforts to secure it ought to receive the cordial support of every citizen who is opposed to gold monometallism.

Senator WOLCOTT at that time undertook, as you see, to defend the President as a friend in good faith of international bimetallicism, but he will now see that the President was even then, as now, as much in the mud as Mr. Secretary Gage was and is now in the mire.

The bill we are now considering is the outgrowth of a Republican caucus, a caucus which was so very intelligent and learned as to be able to pass on, digest, and adjudge in one night's session that this, above all others, is the proper bill to be enacted into law. Of course it must have been submitted to the President and approved by him, and will finally receive his approval as President.

It can not truthfully be said that this is a continuation of the existing gold standard, and the President can not hide behind that plea, for it makes all our public obligations (now payable in gold or silver, or both, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury) payable in gold and gold only, and that, too, by law, the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury being abrogated entirely.

And more, this bill further demonetizes all of our other legal-tender silver coins. It says in effect they are not and shall not be tender money in payment of our past, present, or future public obligations. They may remain as they are, tender in the payment of the plain man's obligation, but they are not good enough for the bondholder, who must be paid in gold and gold only. This bill debases and discredits our silver and paper tenders, which of course tends to destroy their usefulness to a very great extent. This bill, then, does not and can not perpetuate the "existing gold standard," but extends and makes it apply, and by law, to each and all of our public obligations, which has never been the law heretofore. But I shall later on allude to this view of the bill.

The currency bill of 1897, sent by the President to that extra session of the Fifty-fifth Congress just ninety minutes before the adjournment for the session, was, by the edict of the Speaker and a willing Republican majority, passed by the House without examination then and there, and went to a Democratic Senate, where it sleeps.

During the last session of the Fifty-fifth Congress the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures and the Committee on Banking and Currency, dominated by the Republican party, being unable to agree upon a currency bill among themselves, were unable to report one here that they could even debate decently without falling out among themselves and denouncing each other here on the floor of the House to such an extent that one of the bills which they brought in here was sent back to the committee.

So divided were they upon the proposition of riveting the gold standard upon the country that the chairman of the Republican caucus, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] took it upon himself to appoint a committee of Republicans only, who should sit through the summer at Atlantic City and prepare a bill. But not one of the members of that committee was a member of either the Committee on Banking and Currency or the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of the Fifty-fifth Congress. It was charged here on this floor, March 3, 1899, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Walker, a Republican and member of the Fifty-fifth Congress, whose speech I hold in my hand, and it is a notorious fact, that not a member of those two committees of the House was appointed a member of the committee which was to prepare this bill. It is "reported" by a committee of Republicans, not a committee of the House, to a committee of the Republican caucus.

Mr. Walker in his speech quotes the action of the caucus as given in the Post and Star, the latter being an Administration paper. The facts then given by Mr. Walker are undisputed even by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who was present and heard Mr. Walker's speech. I will insert in the RECORD that portion most pertinent which Mr. Walker read in the presence of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], reading only the explanation the gentleman from Ohio made of this unprecedented practice:

[Washington Post, February 3, 1899.]

A CAUCUS ON FINANCE—STRONG SHOWING FOR MONETARY LEGISLATION IN HOUSE—TO NAME A COMMITTEE OF ELEVEN.

General HENDERSON made a strong speech in support of the plan embodied in his resolution, and pointed out the advantage of having this important subject committed to a body serving both in this Congress and the next, and representing the various sections of the country, and, as far as possible, its diverse business and economic interests.

CANNON IN DOUBTFUL MOOD.

Mr. CANNON said he did not think any financial legislation could be carried through until after the next Presidential election.

Representative PAYNE said it would permit careful consideration of the question during the coming months, and the preparation of such a well-matured plan as would commend itself on all hands.

Resolved, That a committee of eleven members of the present House of Representatives, who are members of the Fifty-sixth Congress, shall be appointed by the chairman of this caucus for the purpose of considering monetary legislation and submitting their recommendations to a Republican caucus at the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, with authority to confer with a like committee from the Senate. Adopted.

[Washington Evening Star, February 16, 1899.]

FOR CURRENCY REVISION—REPUBLICAN COMMITTEE SELECTED BY REPRESENTATIVE GROSVENOR.

Representative GROSVENOR, of Ohio, chairman of the Republican caucus, has announced the appointment of the following Republicans of the House as members of the committee provided by the resolution of the Republican caucus on currency legislation: Representatives HENDERSON, of Iowa; PAYNE, New York; DALZELL, Pennsylvania; KEHR, Ohio; HAWLEY, Texas; LOVERING, Massachusetts; OVERSTREET, Indiana; CURTIS, Kansas; LOUD, California; BARCOCK, Wisconsin, and MORRIS, Minnesota.

It will be observed that no member of the Banking and Currency Committee or the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee is put upon this committee. Referring to this fact, Representative GROSVENOR said:

"I made the appointments in that way after full and free conference with most of the members of the committees and with prominent members of the House. It must not be for a moment understood that the omission of members of these committees from the caucus committee was intended to in any wise reflect upon the distinguished gentlemen who compose these two great committees, and, on the contrary, the idea prevailed that inasmuch as any bill or bills which might be agreed upon by the Republican caucus would have to go to one or both of these committees for their final action and report, it would be unwise to ask these gentlemen to make any decision or take sides in any way upon any dispute of policy or detail, and it was deemed wisest and best that the committees should remain wholly independent and noncommittal as to the details of the report, and be free to act independently, with the final judgment of each member uninfluenced and unaffected by the action of the caucus committee. In this way we will ultimately have the opinion of the caucus committee of 11 members of the House and of such committees as the Senate may see fit to provide, and then the deliberate judgment of the proper committee of the House."

I charge that the gentleman from Ohio, the leader and representative of the President on the floor of this House, promised to report his Atlantic City offspring not to the House, but to the "proper committee of the House," and I charge that he has broken his promise not only to his party but to the people at large. The members of the Fifty-sixth Congress are deprived by this action of "the deliberate judgment of a proper committee of this House on this bill." It was the first bill introduced in the House and is "No. 1" on the Calendar. It was never "reported" by any committee of this House. Briefly put, the history of this bill outside of the House, before the House had any jurisdiction of it whatever, is about as follows:

This caucus committee of the Fifty-fifth Congress, all Republicans—named by the caucus chairman, Mr. GROSVENOR—last summer repaired to Atlantic City for the consideration of this vital and fundamental legislation that reaches down into the pockets of every taxpayer of the land and conserves the private welfare of the bondholder—the running mate of the Republican party. After due consideration they swallowed their past records in behalf of bimetallicism and the Constitution, washing their hands of "gold and silver;" and after "due consideration," before breakfast, "Resolved, That the hungry and naked bondholder must be clothed and fed as never before. We will say this time gold, gold, much fine gold, must be writ by the heavy hand of the law in the face of his bond of the past, the present, and the future. The people be damned. The bondholders put us in power and we must stick by them."

And they are like a band of brothers. The secretary of the national Republican committee of 1896, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. OVERSTREET, the friend of Wall street, brings their bill to this House—not to a committee of the House—introduces it; the Rules Committee fix a time—"twelve hours on a side"—for debate by 357 members of this House, and then it is to, as it will, "pass the House without the deliberate judgment of the proper committee of the House," but only the "judgment" of a dumb, driven Republican caucus. Such is the history, so far, of this bill, which later, as law, is to draw the lifeblood of the nation that the bondholder and money ghoul may feast.

I desire now to call your attention in a brief way to the attempts which have previously been made to force "gold" bonds upon the American people.

Congress, in an effort to strengthen our public credit by an act entitled "An act relating to the public debt," endeavored to make our "public indebtedness" payable in gold, just as it tried to do by this bill, but the amendment was defeated in the Senate by a vote of 8 to 34, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cole, Davis, Henderson, Morton, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Spencer—8.
NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sawyer, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Warner, Welch, Wiley, Williams, Wilson—34.

We are not surprised at this, as it is a fact our war bonds "sold for 60 cents on an average."

Later, in 1869, Congress passed an act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," making our "public indebtedness" payable in coin, which, in the language of the Supreme Court, means the gold and silver dollar, the option belonging to the Government to pay in either or both coins.

Senator Edmunds voted against making our bonds payable in gold only in 1869, but reversed himself in 1878 and offered an amendment in the Senate making our bonds by law payable in gold only; but properly his measure was defeated by a vote of 18 to 44.

The amendment read as follows:

That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress heretofore recited are payable, principal and interest, in gold coin or its equivalent; and that any other payment, without the consent of the creditor, would be in violation of the public faith and in derogation of his rights.

Those voting "yea" were:

Anthony, Barnum, Bayard, Burnside, Christiancy, Conkling, Dawes, Eaton, Edmunds, Hamlin, Kernan, McPherson, Mitchell, Morrill, Randolph, Rollins, Sargent, Wadleigh.

Those voting "nay" were:

ALLISON, Armstrong, Bailey of Tennessee, Beck, Booth, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Coke, Conover, Davis of Illinois, Davis of West Virginia, Dennis, Dorsey, Eustis, Ferry, Gordon, Grover, Hereford, Hill, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, JONES of Nevada, Kirkwood, McCreery, McDonald, McMillin, Matthews, Maxey, Merrimon, MORGAN, Oglesby, Paddock, Plumb, Saunders, Spencer, TELLER, Thurman, Voorhees, Wallace, Windom, Withers.

Absent 14:

Blaine, Butler, COCKRELL, Garland, Harris, HOAR, Ingalls, Kellogg, Lamar, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sharon, Whyte.—Record, page 558, volume 27.

The second effort—a foul conspiracy—to force the payment of these war bonds in gold only was made by stopping the coinage of the old silver dollar in 1873 and by stripping the existing silver dollars of their full legal-tender quality in the revised statute of 1874. A panic followed and the people recoiled. They rose in their wrath and demanded a remonetization of silver for their general welfare and to pay these bonds. The people succeeded in partial remonetization in 1878 by passing the Bland-Allison law, for general purposes and to resume specie payment, while a few days before the Stanley Matthews (now known as the Teller) resolution was passed, declaring that it was just, legal, and proper and not in derogation of good faith with our creditors to remonetize and pay these bonds in the old silver dollar. These measures were all passed through the efforts of the Democratic party, and the Bland-Allison law over the veto of President Hayes, who contended that it was the agreement and right, legal, and just to pay these war bonds in gold only.

Again, on February 14, 1895, President Cleveland's plan of issuing bonds payable in gold only, by law, met with disastrous defeat in this House by a vote of 120 yeas to 187 nays. We find the following members of the present House, Republicans, who bitterly opposed and voted against gold bonds then who now favor and will vote for this bill, to wit: BROMWELL, CANNON, COOPER, CURTIS, DOLLIVER, FLETCHER, GRIFFIN, GROSVENOR, GROW, HENDERSON (the Speaker), HOPKINS, HITT, HEPBURN, HULL, LACEY, LOUD, MARSH, MCCLEARY, MERCER, TAWNEY, VAN VOORHIS.

On that eventful day the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, said:

I believe in preserving the national faith. I believe that every obligation of this Government, under well-settled law as construed for almost two decades by all Administrations, and as it is to be enforced by virtue of an honest sentiment of an honest people, is payable, at the option of the holder, in gold or its equivalent.

I stop to say, in 1876 he said:

Our bonds were payable in silver or gold at the option of the Government.

He continued:

Coin means gold in the Government obligations at the holder's option. The country has so understood it; and the world so understands it to-day. * * * Bear with me a minute while I state briefly my reasons for voting against this bill. I am not going into ancient history. Let us go into modern history—last month and this month.

He then proceeded in his usual powerful way to condemn President Cleveland for proposing this gold-bond measure, and continued:

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, if the President in good faith put in this reserve, if in ten days gold bonds were authorized specifically by Congress—if it was done—it made them no better. Did he do it in good faith? No. Why, then, was it put in? To muddy the waters and to deceive the country, while the favorite syndicates go away with the ten millions of dishonorable profit. [Applause on the Republican side.]

His time was extended and he finished his speech in a way that is extremely appropriate for every patriotic member of this House to close his. He said:

Now, with all these facts standing around, I say it in sorrow that I can not look with pride on the performance of the Executive of the nation. I say further that if it were a Republican Secretary of the Treasury that had made this contract this Democratic House in my judgment would have impeached him. Yet these gentlemen say our credit is gone. Why, right here I have a telegram, received this morning, that the 4 per cents due in 1907, payable in coin, command in the markets of the world a premium of 10 1/2 to-day—now—at this moment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This same class of bonds sold December 5, 1899, at 112 1/2.

This same question was up for consideration in this House on July 13, 1876, when the distinguished gentleman from Illinois took the very opposite position and said that our obligations were payable legally, equitably, and morally in the standard silver dollar, and cited as conclusive proof, which it was, an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States (7 Wallace, page 26), all our bond-issuing statutes pertinent, and the report of the Treasurer, and wound up his argument in this language:

THE LAW AND JUSTICE.

The nature of the obligation resting upon the Government under these acts is tersely set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress, as follows:

"But the purpose and meaning of the acts in question are not left open for forensic discussion, having been authoritatively settled by the unanimous opinion of the highest judicial tribunal known to our Constitution. As soon after the termination of the war as 1868 it was argued before the Supreme Court that the legal-tender notes of the United States were issued as money, a substitute for metallic currency, and that, having been made legal tender in payment of all debts, including (with certain exceptions) the Government's own, of course, when presented for payment, if similar notes, being legal tender, were offered in exchange for them, the debt would be discharged by a delivery of new notes of the same kind, and so on ad infinitum. To this argument the court replied:

"Apart from the quality of legal tender impressed upon them by acts of Congress, of which we now say nothing, their circulation as currency depends upon the extent to which they are received in payment, on the quantity in circulation, and on the credit given to the promises they bear. In other respects they resemble the bank notes formerly issued as currency.

SUPREME COURT.

"But, on the other hand, it is equally clear that these notes are obligations of the United States. Their name imports obligation. Every one of them expresses upon its face an engagement of the nation to pay the bearer a certain sum. The dollar note is an engagement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coin dollar of the United States—a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver, authenticated as such by the stamp of the Government."

This authoritative declaration of the Supreme Court defines clearly and precisely the meaning and intent of Congress in the acts which authorized the issue, and should be accepted as conclusive of the obligation and duty of the Government to provide for the payment in specie of all such issues.

Nor is this all. Subsequent to this decision, and for the purpose of putting a quietus upon the mischievous discussion of the subject, Congress, on the 18th day of March, 1869, declared by public act that "the United States solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin." (7 Wall., page 26; Chase, C. J.)

MR. CANNON'S OPINION.

I have referred to these acts of Congress and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States for the reason that on the part of certain gentlemen upon this floor and a great many throughout the country there appears to be a misapprehension as to what the contract is between the Government on the one hand and its creditors upon the other; and from the above references to the law, as well as a careful examination of the text of the different acts, I am prepared to state— (7 Wall., page 26; Chase, C. J.)

LAW AND CONTRACT.

First. That there is not one dollar of the indebtedness of the United States, interest bearing or noninterest bearing, bond or greenback, but what the Government has the right, legal, equitable, and moral, under the contract to pay in coin, and that coin is gold or the standard silver dollar of the fineness and weight provided by law at the time the indebtedness was made.

Second. It further appears that the faith of the Government is pledged to collect duties on imports in coin (either gold or silver, or both) for the payment of interest upon the public debt.

Third. That the faith of the Government is pledged, until the redemption of the greenbacks, never to issue more than $400,000,000 of the same.

Having shown the right under the contract to pay our debt in gold and silver, or either, let us inquire briefly as to the policy of paying our debts in silver as well as in gold.

He had already said:

THE BOND CONTRACT.

Mr. Speaker, I have very great respect for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield], and also many gentlemen on the other side of the House who oppose the legislation spoken of, but I do not agree with him in denouncing the proposition to remonetize silver and paying our debts with it as swindling, and his stigmatizing silver with the term "cheap and nasty."

Sir, it has with gold been used as money for ages past, and will be, in my opinion, for ages to come. It is in common with gold the money of the Constitution, and whether it has grown less valuable or gold has grown more valuable is not the question. By the letter and spirit of the contract we have the right to pay every dollar of the indebtedness of the United States in standard silver dollars weighing 412 grains, nine-tenths of it fine silver and one-tenth of it alloy, as well as in gold, and I should like to know what right the gentleman has to denounce as swindling a proposition to do what we contracted to do. I suppose if gold were cheaper than silver, then the gentleman would say it is swindling to pay in gold.

If the gentleman owed me $10,000, and by the contract had the option to pay it either in gold dollars or silver dollars, and had to be industrious and economize to pay either, does he claim that it would be swindling to pay me in silver dollars because they were the cheapest?

If the gentleman did business in that way on his private account, before six months had elapsed any court would appoint a conservator to take charge of his property and manage his estate.

This distinguished statesman declared silver was not "cheap" and "nasty," but that it was the money of the Constitution, and good enough for anybody, and that to remonetize the white metal we could more easily pay our bonds and that free coinage would bring about a parity. He said:

FREE COINAGE WILL CAUSE A PARITY.

Now, then, let us remonetize silver. There is, as before shown, about as much silver in value in the world as there is gold. The result will be that silver, as compared with gold, will grow more valuable; gold, as compared with silver, will grow less valuable, and they will meet, each traveling half way, at about the value of the greenback; and thus we would have silver at par with gold, gold at par with silver, and the greenback at par with gold and silver.

WE SHOULD REMONETIZE SILVER.

But the objection is made that the United States may remonetize silver, and that Germany and the other nations will not. In answer, I say so much the greater necessity for the United States remonetizing silver; that is the only way we can get even, for by adopting the gold standard only they have made the dollar more valuable than it was when they bought our bonds and loaned us their capital; and silver ceasing to be used as money, silver coin is thrown upon the market, and has depreciated as compared with gold. Now, if we remonetize silver that will create a demand for it here, and it will flow into this country in exchange for our products, and we will in turn use it in paying our debts in common with gold as between each other, and in paying the $50,000,000 to $70,000,000 of annual interest upon our foreign debt.

He also decapitated the "theorist," the "politician," the "speculator," and the gold lover generally in the following very lucid and comprehensive, patriotic language:

But I want to say to the other side of the House that one-tenth part of the time given to the maturity and consideration of this measure that is used in the effort to make capital for the fall campaign will suffice to perfect the details and pass the bill.

There is another reason why this legislation should be had at once. It would settle the money question permanently. If there is any one thing more than another that paralyzes business it is the power Congress has, with our unsettled condition of finance, to tinker with the currency; it sets the theorist, the politician, and the speculator to work proposing all manner of schemes to better our condition, nine-tenths of which are purely impracticable or thoroughly selfish; the producer and the trader are kept in a state of feverish excitement, doubtful as to what bad results may follow from unwise legislation.

THE WAY OUT.

There is but one way out of it: Restore the money of the Constitution by remonetizing silver; give the Government and each individual the chance to comply with its or his contract; nothing more and nothing less. Then the laws governing demand and supply will regulate the money and the credit of the country as they regulate the production of corn and wheat; and under the operation of that primal law imposed upon man by the Creator, "By the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," each individual, under stable laws and stable money, will work out his own salvation, and as a people we enter upon a secure and stable era of prosperity.

We here see that the opinion of this distinguished son of Illinois has changed, but I ask him if the Constitution has been changed? If the Supreme Court has reversed the 7th Wallace case? If the word "coin" means gold only? If silver is too "cheap" and "nasty" to pay the bondholder?

Mr. Chairman, a man's opinions may change, but the Constitution and the authorities the gentleman cited have not been changed or reversed, and I am at a loss to know how the gentleman from Illinois reconciles his two opposing positions, based as they are upon constitutional grounds, and that, too, when the credit of the Government is as good, if not better, than ever before; we have no "run" on the Treasury as in 1895, when he voted against gold bonds and said that if the Secretary of the Treasury in 1895 had not been a Democrat the then Democratic House would have impeached him for insisting on gold bonds.

Now, I ask him what he thinks on the question of impeachment of our present officials, who, backed by the bondholder, demand the passage of this infamous bill? We will not assume the high privilege, Mr. Chairman, of impeaching them now; we will leave to the untirred, unbent, and unbought people of this great country that pleasing task when their tribunal sits in November, 1900. But, Mr. Chairman, this noble son of Illinois had to aid him in 1895 the eloquent, the ever-present, powerful, and distinguished son of Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, in opposing this gold issue of 1895. In a speech in this House, found at page 2185, volume 27, of the Fifty-third Congress, third session, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said:

One of the main stipulations is that it is to be paid in gold because it is better than coin. Why better than coin? *

He then demonstrated that it was not, and continued:

And when you have steered away from the landmarks of the Republican party, and the Democratic party, too, since the war, you have started in to begin the destruction of bimetalism as perfectly as if every silver dollar upon the earth were destroyed. [Loud applause.] We stand here as Republicans, pledged in our national resolutions to maintain the parity between the two metals. [Applause.] We come here and are asked by a bribe of sixteen and a half million dollars, payable in thirty years, to make the discrimination between the gold bonds and the coin bonds. Fellow Republicans, let me read to you our platform, the declarations of our principles upon which we have marched both to victory and defeat.

In 1888 we said: "The Republican party is in favor of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver."

In 1892 we said: "The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetalism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal."

These are the declarations of our party, and these are the principles of the Republicans of the United States. And, Mr. Speaker, for one, faithful to these platform declarations, I will not vote for this measure. [Loud applause.] I believe that it is fraught with dishonor and not with honor. I believe that the people of the United States, when they look beyond the mere temporary expressions of this Presidential message, will stand by the men who in this storm have stood by the people and against this combination of European financiers. They will stand by the men who have stood faithful to the principles and the landmarks of their party. [Renewed applause.] No man will stand longer or fight harder for the Government than I will; but I will not permit the prostitution of the powers of this Government to the building up of one interest in this country or in any other country to the destruction and overthrow of all the interests of the people of this country. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The distinguished speaker had already cited at length the gold contract proposed, etc., and said:

Our answer, Mr. Speaker, to all this ought to be that we will not do it. For the first time in the history of this country we are to put the word "gold" in our long-time bonds, and we do it for the purpose, with the stipulation, that there is a difference of three-fourths of 1 per cent between "gold" and "coin." That means something. This syndicate does not offer $16,500,000 for nothing. This syndicate does not understand that one bond is as good as another. It means more than that they will make a difference of sixteen and a half millions of dollars in the cost to the Government of these two bonds.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who in the same debate opposed gold bonds, but who now favors this bill, said:

And I want to call his [Mr. PAYNE of New York] attention to the fact that he proposes in his rescue, or attempt at rescue, the change of the whole policy of his party, to go back upon all the declarations of his party, and to institute a new method, a new policy, and call for new following.

There has never been a day since this party of his has been in existence that it has not contended for the equal status of gold and silver in the United States. [Applause.] If there is one proposition more certainly impressed upon the minds of the Republicans than another it is that we will as a party, by all means within our power, see to it that these two metals have equal potency in this land.

Here is a new departure. I am told that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his interview yesterday with a committee of this House, admitted that if this bond was issued, if this country now enters upon a policy of gold bonds, no other kind of bonds would probably ever be known in its entire history. Are we ready for that? [Cries of "No! No!"]

He then read the Democrats' and Republicans' platforms on the gold and silver question and commented on the last lines of the Republican plank about—the maintenance of the parity of the two metals, and the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether gold, silver, or paper, shall at all times be equal—

And with great force said:

Equal, and here we are called upon now to declare that this dollar of ours, this silver dollar of ours, has not the same debt-paying power that a gold dollar has. I affirm, notwithstanding the language of the gentleman [Mr. PAYNE] who stood here a few moments ago where I stand now, and said that our indebtedness was payable in gold alone, I say not so. [Loud applause.]

There is no obligation of the United States save gold certificates that may not honestly be paid in silver dollars [applause], and every creditor of the United States knew the fact when he permitted himself to become a creditor of the Government.—Record, volume 27, part 3, Fifty-third Congress, page 2198.

He says that in 1895, and in 1899 he speaks for gold bonds now and hereafter.

Mind you, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Cleveland wanted to "issue" bonds and make them payable by law in gold only, which by doing he contended we would save $16,500,000, a certain syndicate making the proposition to take all these bonds. This House bill No. 1 proposes to make our bonds already issued and those hereafter issued and all our public obligations, past and future, payable by law in gold. Now, I ask, What syndicate is behind House bill No. 1? How much will the bond owners make without turning their hands, if this bill becomes a law, on their existing bond holdings? Millions untold! We give them almost an incalculable sum without a single recompense on the bonds already issued, while a similar profit will follow on obligations issued hereafter under this bill. I hope a calculation is possible in the near future showing how much the bondholders will make by this measure, and that, too, as stated, without raising their hands.

The last effort at gold bonds that I recall was in the Fifty-fourth Congress, when an effort was made in some Territorial obligations, then payable in lawful money, to make them payable in gold only. On a rising vote the proposition was overwhelmingly defeated, both parties voting in the main against it.

The Hon. Edwards Pierpont, in a letter to the New York Times of April 14, 1884, said not one of our bonds had any proviso for their payment in gold only. He said:

There is not an outstanding bond, coupon, or greenback issued by the United States which may not be lawfully paid in silver. Not one of them on its face or back, or in the statute authorizing the issue, or in declaration, or in resolution of Congress, has any proviso that they shall be paid in gold. And the act of February 23, 1878, directing the coinage of silver dollars, declared that such dollars shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote with great pleasure against this bill. I am a bimetalist. I believe in the free coinage of both gold and silver at a legal ratio in full-tender coin. I believe that bimetallicism is the policy and the law of the Constitution, and being founded in the Constitution it can not be repealed by any statute we may pass. The Constitution can not be repealed by statute. Gold and silver are admittedly the money of the Constitution. No unselfish, enlightened man disputes this. Therefore I contend that Congress has no power to stop the coinage of silver or gold, and that if it has the power to stop either, it can stop both, and thus deprive the people of the money of the Constitution, as well as the States, counties, and cities of our land, who do and must necessarily make and pay debts in performing their respective functions.

If the States, as they have, have the right to make both "gold and silver tender in the payment of debts" without the intervention of the United States, what right has Congress, though having the exclusive right to coin money and regulate its value, to stop the coinage of gold and silver, or either, thus directly prohibiting the States from using gold and silver or either in the payment of their debts? No such right or power was granted to Congress.

Indeed, the States, under the Confederation, and therefore before the Constitution, had the right to coin the money of our colonial and Revolutionary fathers, and when the Constitution was formed they reserved to themselves, the States, expressly in the Constitution the right to make, and therefore the right to have, gold and silver full legal tender, simply surrendering to the Congress the power and right to "coin money and regulate the value thereof." Previous to the Confederation, as a colonial inheritance, anterior to the Constitution, as now, I contend, the people had and always reserved to themselves as their own personal and collective right the privilege—nay, more the right—to take their money metal, gold and silver, to the public mint and have it made into money whenever they chose to so do. They fought for and wrested from Mother England this right. It came with our independence more than a century ago. It is theirs, and it does not belong to the Congress nor the States, and never did, to shut up the mints and shut off the people from the high privilege of taking their money metal at will to the mints for coinage.

There are three terms in the Constitution that refer to money. They are "gold and silver," "money," and "dollars," and appear in the following form, to wit:

The Congress shall have the power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coins.

No State shall coin money, make anything but gold and silver tender in the payment of debts.

By amendment to the Constitution, Article VII, it is ordained:

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved.

The term "money" was used, as shown by Elliott's Debates, in framing the Constitution, as synonymous with "gold and silver." They meant then one and the same thing. The term "gold and silver" was settled upon at the same time, as shown by Elliott's Debates, after grave and many discussions. The word "and" is clearly conjunctive and not disjunctive. Unsuccessful efforts were made during these debates, as they show, to insert the word "or" where "and" now appears, but finally abandoned, and the conjunctive word "and" was used to fasten the two metals together in the Constitution, as they now read—gold and silver—there to remain until amended, and not to be disjoined by a statute, State or national. Bimetallicism is therefore a part of and embedded in the Constitution. The money unit is there in the same way. It rests on both metals.

And Mr. Hamilton, in his report on the Mint, quotes the Constitution as I have, except amendment 7, and upon that, as well as a wise policy, fixed the money unit on "both metals," which Mr. Jefferson approved and all of our Presidents down to the crime of 1873, when gold only was made the money unit, which is being perpetuated in the present measure. In support of these contentions I take pleasure and pride in citing the speeches of some of the greatest statesmen we ever produced—Hamilton, Jefferson, Webster, Gallatin, Hunter, Jackson, Garland, John Randolph Tucker, Morgan, Beck, Pierpont, Thurman, Coke, Maxey, Jeham G. Harris, VEST, COCKRELL, and, strange to say, President Hayes. President Hayes, in his fourth annual message, 1880, said:

The Constitution in express terms recognizes both gold and silver as the only legal-tender money. To banish either of these metals from our currency is to narrow and limit the circulating medium of exchange, to the disparagement of important interests.

President Hayes saw the error of his veto message in 1878, and before his time expired we find him thus speaking and urging Congress to perpetuate the coinage of the silver dollar, so prosperous had our country become under the influence of the Bland-Allison law, which he had vetoed.

Mr. Blaine, in a speech on February 7, 1878, said:

First, I believe gold and silver coin to be the money of the Constitution—indeed, the money of the American people anterior to the Constitution, which that great organic law recognized as quite independent of its own existence. No power was conferred on Congress to declare that either metal should not be money. Congress has therefore, in my judgment, no power to demonetize silver any more than to demonetize gold; no power to demonetize either any more than to demonetize both. In this statement I am but repeating the weighty dictum of the first constitutional lawyers. "I am certainly of opinion," said Mr. Webster, "that gold and silver, at rates fixed by Congress, constitute the legal standard of value in this country and that neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard or to displace this standard." Few persons can be found, I apprehend, who will maintain that Congress possesses the power to demonetize both gold and silver, or that Congress could be justified in prohibiting the coinage of both; and yet in logic and legal construction it would be difficult to show where and why the power of Congress over silver is greater than over gold, greater over either than over the two. If, therefore, silver has been demonetized, I am in favor of remonetizing it. If its coinage has been prohibited, I am in favor of ordering it to be resumed. If it has been restricted, I am in favor of having it enlarged.

On the money unit Mr. Blaine said:

I believe the struggle now going on in this country and other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful, produce widespread disaster in the end throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole unit of value must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property. If, as the most reliable statistics affirm, there are nearly seven thousand millions of coin or bullion in the world, not very equally divided between gold and silver, it is impossible to strike silver out of existence as money without results which will prove distressing to millions and utterly disastrous to tens of thousands. Alexander Hamilton, in his able and invaluable report in 1791 on the establishment of a mint, declared that "to annul the use of either gold or silver as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full circulation with the evils of a scanty circulation." I take no risks in saying that the benefits of a full circulation and the evils of a scanty circulation are both immeasurably greater to-day than they were when Mr. Hamilton uttered these weighty words, always provided that the circulation is one of actual money and not of depreciated promises to pay.

In the report from which I have already quoted Mr. Hamilton argues at length in favor of a double standard, and all the subsequent experience of well-nigh 90 years has brought out no clearer statement of the whole case nor developed a more complete comprehension of this subtle and difficult subject. "On the whole," says Mr. Hamilton, "it seems most advisable not to attach the unit exclusively to either of the metals, because this can not be done effectually without destroying the office and character of one of them as money and reducing it to the situation of mere merchandise." And then Mr. Hamilton wisely concludes that this reduction of either of the metals to mere merchandise (I again quote his exact words) "would probably be a greater evil than occasional variations in the unit from the fluctuations in the relative value of the metals, especially if care be taken to regulate the proportion between them with an eye to their average commercial value." I do not think that this country, holding so vast a proportion of the world's supply of silver in its mountains and its mines, can afford to reduce the metal to the "situation of mere merchandise." If silver ceases to be used as money in Europe and America, the great mines of the Pacific slope will be closed and dead. Mining enterprises of the gigantic scale existing in this country can not be carried on to provide backs for looking-glasses and to manufacture cream-pitchers and sugar bowls. A vast source of wealth to this entire country is destroyed the moment silver is permanently disused as money. It is for us to check that tendency and bring the continent of Europe back to the full recognition of the value of the metal as a medium of exchange.

Mr. Blaine, as did the gentleman of Illinois, Mr. CANNON, found the money unit is fixed on both metals by and in the Constitution.

The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, took the same position of Mr. Blaine, citing the same authorities, Hamilton and Jefferson, in his speech in 1876, and said in addition:

And let me here say that we have just as much right under our contract to call silver the unit or standard of value and par and to say that the greenback is above par by 11 per cent and gold above par by 24 per cent as advocates of the gold standard have to claim that gold should be the unit or standard of value and that greenbacks are below par and that silver is below par.

Now, sir, we all remember that a few days ago the distinguished gentleman [Mr. CANNON] said to my colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] that he was living in the present, and not living with "the ghouls in the graveyards." I want to know if the distinguished gentleman has placed the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, which in 1876 he stood by, in the grave with the money ghouls? I want to know if he has placed the Constitution of his country in the grave with the money ghouls? He said that under the Constitution and under our laws and under the common law gold and silver were full legal tender when coined by our Government, and in concluding his speech he said all would be well if we restored silver to its time-honored place. [Applause.]

Entertaining, Mr. Chairman, these views, based, as they are, upon the wise policy of bimetallicism as set forth in the Constitution, which I am sworn to support, I must vote against this bill. It is contrary to the Constitution and its principles and the welfare of the people, and is framed and driven through this House by the bondholders, who would desecrate these sacred principles to fill their pockets with money poured into our coffers by the taxpayers of their country, who are soon to groan under its heavy burdens. This bill perpetuates gold as the money unit. It perpetuates the single gold standard. It perpetuates and intensifies the further demonetization of the old silver dollar. It demonetizes, debases, and restricts the money uses of silver, and casts suspicion over all our other moneys. It puts the bondholder and his rights above the masses and their rights. It bleeds the plain people for the aristocratic bondholder. It is a plutocratic measure throughout.

The express policy of this Government on finance is to keep our two money coins on a parity, and so determined are our people on this that Congress has expressed this policy in an old and now existing statute that is the law of the land. This bill does make inevitably a disparity between the two coins by the mighty hand of the law. It disarranges that parity between the two coins our statutes were enacted to maintain. The bill is, therefore, contrary to public policy as expressed in our statute law and at the ballot box. I oppose the bill for that reason and for turning the people, very largely, over to the national banks for their paper money. You know the banks can let out and call in their bank issues, and by doing so can make or break the surrounding communities and States. Andrew Jackson successfully opposed such a menace to the public welfare. He was right then, and the principle is right now.

Make our bonds payable in gold only, and at once the bondholder loses all interest, if he has any, in the silver bullion or silver coin. He becomes silver's enemy at once. Why? Because his bond, once payable, can no longer be paid, in silver coin, but is payable in gold only. He would rather bear than bull the price of silver, because it would increase the price of gold, make his gold dollar worth that much more of silver.

He would further divorce the price of the two coins, the very thing the Government is pledged to maintain and encourage. Continue our bonds as coin bonds, and we continue the selfish interest of the bondholder with our efforts to maintain the parity of the two coins. Again, make our obligations payable in gold only, and we make the owner thereof the personal and political enemy of domestic bimetalism and international bimetalism, because in such event silver would become the equal in fact of gold—that is, meet each other halfway, and thus reach what we call a parity.

You can see at once that gold bonds will become the stumbling-block in our endeavors to maintain the established policy of our Government, expressed by existing statutes, of maintaining the parity of the two coins and to the achievement of bimetalism, which the people want. This bill, when law, intervenes and cuts off all hope of any such arrangement, in the face of the fact that the Bryan and McKinley vote combined in 1896 favored international bimetalism if it could be had, while in addition the Bryan vote was for bimetalism without waiting for the consent of any nation.

This law is the straw that breaks the camel's back. But bimetalism by and through the Republican party is now an abandoned policy, and this measure is conclusive proof of the fact. We must look to the Democratic party, that ever has been and ever will be, so long as it remains true to its past history, the friend of the masses in truth, for that bimetalism with which our forefathers were familiar, planted by them in the Constitution.

Again, this bill, making all of our past, present, and future public obligations payable in gold only, creates, I contend, unnecessarily an increased demand and call for our gold coin and gold metal, and thus the immense increase in our gold production will be gobbled up in paying off these gold obligations, thereby necessarily turning this large gold increase from the everyday channels of trade and commerce into Wall street and the stock jobbers' recesses.

In this way the good effects of our increased amounts of gold money are reduced and fall short of the happy effect that would follow if we continued the payment of our bonds and public obligations in coin, gold and silver, or either, and in the discretion not of the payee but payor, as at law, and as it should be and was until the Republican party gave the option to select the money of payment to the payee.

Much has been said in the House about prosperity. When war was declared against Spain the Dingley tariff was proving a failure as a revenue producer. The issue of bonds to pay the necessary expenses of the Government were almost in sight when war was declared. A war tariff was imposed on our people, and everything in sight, except a few rich concerns that were able to control legislation, was taxed.

The Government then sent its purchasing agents throughout this country and said to the owners of any war paraphernalia, "What is your price? We want your property to carry on this war." The owner set his own price, and the Government paid it, spot cash. In this way not only large sums of money were scattered throughout the country, but large prices were given, as we all know—some outrageously exorbitant. This increased demand and sudden dissemination of money throughout the country started the wheels of many a closed manufactory and caused the sale of many products that had been lying on the shelf for a long time.

There is a difference, Mr. Chairman, in saying to a party, "How much will you take for your property?" and paying at once the price demanded, and a property owner going out and looking for a purchaser and begging some one to buy at any price. Again, war was declared and the President called for over 200,000 volunteers. They were, and must have been, able-bodied and, in the main, fine business men. They were swept into the camps of the country and detained there for a long time. Their places had to be and were filled by those left behind, who were idle and had been for months, if not years. In this way idle labor was absorbed and increased wages demanded and received, for urgent orders were had, war orders, that had to be filled in a certain time.

The result was that in places prosperity and an increase of wages followed. I hope it may continue, but I doubt it. This prosperity is a war prosperity. We had the same thing north of the Ohio River during the civil war thirty years ago. Labor, as you all remember, became so scarce that Congress appropriated several millions of dollars and sent agents to Europe to encourage foreign labor to come to the United States, and succeeded. Here is a case where history is repeating itself, except we had enough idle labor at home to do our work. I hope this prosperity has come and come to stay, but I doubt it. What I want, Mr. Chairman, is general prosperity, a prosperity for everybody, and one that will come and stay.

I desire here briefly and hurriedly to reply to some statements made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], who led off in a set speech.

First. "That the Spanish mill dollar was never coined in America"—but it was coined in foreign countries and brought to America in immense amounts, and served our colonial and Revolutionary fathers faithfully and for many years.

Second. "That the act of January 18, 1837, changed the ratio from 1 to 16 to 1 to 15.983 by again modifying the quantity of metal in the coin." This statement is misleading. The amount of fine silver in the old silver dollar was never changed, while the amount of fine gold in the gold coins was reduced twice—1834 and 1837.

Third. The coinage act of February 21, 1853, did not discontinue the double standard nor the free coinage of the old silver dollar or the gold coins. It simply reduced the amount of fine silver in the half-dollar, quarter, dime and half-dime, and limited their tender of the coinage thereunder—for what? To prevent their exportation, while the Government assumed the right to buy bullion and coin these small coins to increase their coinage and secure a much-needed small change. The half-dollar, quarter, and dime coined up to the act of 1853, amounting to $85,436,376, were and remained full legal tender up to the act of 1874. In none, no, not one, of our coinage laws, up to April 1, 1873, was standard silver demonetized. Free coinage of the gold and silver dollars and eagles was cautiously guarded and continued down to 1873. Even the trade dollar was given the right of free coinage.

Fourth. The gold standard begun with us April 1, 1873, when the coinage act of February 12, 1873, took effect. Previous to this date the people could take either or both their gold or silver untrammelled to our mint and have it coined in the full legal-tender money. It is false that we were previous to 1873 on a gold standard. These facts can not be successfully disputed, though often smeared over by the gold advocates and the truth ignorantly, if not corruptly, perverted to mislead a confiding public. I quote again, in conclusive proof of my contention, from the very high authority on any subject in this House, from the speech of the honorable Representative from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, in this House July 13, 1876. This he said:

And, strange to say, the United States being the debtor nation, having the right to pay that debt in gold and silver of a certain fineness, with her vast mineral wealth, especially of silver, that is being developed by the labor, pluck, and energy of the Americans, under the lead of science and experience, has unwittingly assented to the demonetization of silver. This legislation was had in the Forty-second Congress, February 12, 1873, by a bill to regulate the mints of the United States, and practically abolished silver as money by failing to provide for the coinage of the silver dollar.

It was not discussed, as shown by the RECORD, and neither members of Congress nor the people understood the scope of the legislation. The result is that gold has become the only standard by which values are measured, silver ceasing to be used as money, and gold as compared with silver has become more valuable, and silver as compared with gold has become less valuable, so that if we actually pay in gold, not having the privilege to pay silver, we have decreased our ability to pay by at least from 20 to 30 per cent; in other words, we decrease our ability to pay by the amount of silver we have to pay with, it no longer being available to us to pay in the discharge of our indebtedness the same as gold.

He then quotes from a leading Republican official, as follows:

Dr. Linderman, Director of the Mint, fully understood this, for in his report for the year 1873, page 21, he says:

"The gradual adoption of the gold standard and consequent demonetization of silver will, of course, be followed by an increase in the value of gold, or, what is the same thing, a decrease in the price of articles measured by it. Indeed, it is quite certain that this effect is already perceptible in some portions of Europe."

I may add that Dr. Linderman, in his book, Money and Legal Tender, at page 44, says:

The declaration in the coinage act of 1873 that the gold dollar was thereafter the unit of value, and the omission of the silver dollar from the coins to be struck under the provisions of that act, placed the United States upon the single gold standard.

This is clear and explicit. Again, up to at least 1857 we had the foreign silver coins full tender in immense quantities, and the $77,015,348.50 half dollars, quarters, dimes, and half dimes coined before 1853, that were full tender up to 1874, and the old silver dollar was still open to free coinage.

The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. OVERSTREET, in his speech of Monday, says:

Prior to 1873, when the gold standard was adopted, there had been issued by the Government only 8,031,238 silver dollars.

Here he admits the advent of the gold standard was in 1873, but is unfair enough to state that we coined only 8,031,238 silver dollars, which is clearly misleading, and at most a half truth, for, in addition to that number of silver-dollar pieces, we coined before the act of 1853, in half dollars, dimes, and half dimes, $77,015,348.50 which was full legal tender, as much so as the silver or gold dollar.

The amount of these small coins and their full-tender quality is overlooked by the gold advocates, and hence this reference. The following official letter is given, which is self-explanatory:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT.
Washington, D. C., December 13, 1892.

SIR: As requested by you, I append herewith a statement of the coinage of fractional silver (excluding 3-cent pieces) from 1792 to June 1, 1853, and the coinage of silver dollars from 1792 to February 12, 1873.

Coinage of fractional silver—1792 to June 1, 1853.

Half dollars.....	$66,492,644.50
Quarter dollars.....	4,006,595.50
Dimes.....	4,016,731.10
Half dimes.....	1,890,377.40
Total.....	77,015,348.50
Silver dollars, 1792 to February 12, 1873.....	8,031,238.00
	85,046,586.50

Respectfully,

GEO. E. ROBERTS,
Director of the Mint.

Hon. J. W. GAINES,
House of Representatives.

We then had current legal-tender silver coin before 1873, $85,046,586.50 and oceans of foreign full-tender silver coins, which well served the people and bondholder alike.

In 1806 the old dollar coinage was suspended by Mr. Jefferson, but the legal right remained to coin it nevertheless, and in addition, on April 20, 1806, ten days previous to this order of suspension, May 1, 1806, President Jefferson approved a bill making foreign gold and silver coins full legal tender in the payment of debts, which more than took the place of the suspended silver-dollar coinage and supplied every want of the people.

At no time did Jefferson suspend the coinage of standard silver money. On the contrary, in the order suspending the old dollar coinage he continued the free coinage and urged the coinage in large amounts of the half-dollar, quarter, dime, and half-dime, which, as I have stated, were full legal tender in the payment of all debts, public and private. It is a foul aspersion upon Jefferson's patriotic deeds and his democratic acts to say that he thus abused the bimetallic principles planted in the Constitution, which he helped to write, as well as the first mint report, in which he said to Mr. Hamilton:

I return you the report on the mint. I concur with you that the unit must stand on both metals.

And yet by this bill the fraud of 1873, which put the unit on one metal, gold, must be perpetuated, and all our public obligations, past and future, are to be paid in gold only. Here is the language of the order suspending the old dollar coinage, found in the Secretary of State's office in 1878:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 1, 1806.

ROBERT PATTERSON, esq.,
Director of the Mint.

SIR: In consequence of a representation from the directors of the Bank of the United States that considerable purchases have been made of dollars coined at the mint for the purpose of exporting them, and as it is probable further purchases and exportations will be made, the President directs that all silver to be coined at the mint shall be of small denominations, so that the value of the largest pieces shall not exceed half a dollar.

I am, sir, etc.,

JAMES MADISON.

President Jefferson did this:

First. Twenty days before (April 20, 1806) he stopped the dollar coinage (May 1, 1806) he created a substitute entirely acceptable by making foreign silver full tender for all debts, the Spanish milled dollar being already a full tender.

Second. He stopped the silver dollar coinage thereafter to prevent its exportation and to encourage and give place to the increased coinage of the full-tender small silver coins to supply change much needed.

Third. The free coinage in increased quantities of full legal-tender silver coins was continued and they were coined in larger amounts.

Fourth. He perpetuated the bimetallic double standard of the Constitution, because the half dollar, quarter, dime, and half dime were full legal tender and left open to free coinage.

Fifth. He continued the money unit on both metals and the full tender quality to all old silver dollars and foreign silver coin.

Mr. OVERSTREET says:

The debates in Congress just prior to the passage of the act of February 21, 1875, clearly marked the change of sentiment against the further effort to maintain a double standard.

This I deny, because, first, the double standard was perpetuated; second, the increased use of silver was provided for; third, the free coinage of gold and silver was continued; and, in addition to that, Senator R. M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, as chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, denounced the adoption of either one of the metals alone as ruinous to the welfare of the people. He declared:

The mischief would be great indeed if all the world were to adopt but one of the precious metals as the standard of value. To adopt gold alone would diminish the specie currency more than one-half; and the reduction the other way, should silver be taken as the only standard, would be large enough to prove highly disastrous to the human race.

Again, Mr. Sanford, of New York, by a report made to the Senate in the Twenty-first Congress, amongst other things, said:

The necessity of occasional adjustments is a small inconvenience when compared with the great inconvenience of using only one of the metals, and such has been the experience of mankind.

Strange, indeed, must be that policy which can tolerate 500 different kinds of paper money and can not tolerate both gold and silver.

The Constitution of the United States evidently contemplates that the money of this country shall be gold and silver. Our system of money, established in 1792, fully adopts the principle that it is expedient to coin and use both metals as money, and such has always been the opinion of the people of the United States.

Albert Gallatin, banker, financier, and statesman, favored the double standard and, in speaking of England demonetizing silver, said:

Even if the precedent were good, it could not be conveniently adopted by the United States. To the exclusion of silver there are great objections. The American dollar, or 371½ grains of pure silver, is the unit of money and standard of value on which all public and private contracts are founded.

Again, Mr. OVERSTREET says, in speaking of the Bland-Allison Act.

With all the ills which this measure (act of 1878) brought upon the country, it was far to be preferred to an absolute free-coinage bill.

Mr. Chairman, I deny there were any ill effects from that law. Prosperity throughout this gold-standard-cursed land came, and promptly, to the humble and exalted, the sweeter and the bondholder, the States and the Federal Government. And I challenge the gentlemen to show a single message or Thanksgiving proclamation of President Hayes that does not support my declaration. We accumulated over four hundred and seventy millions of gold in the Treasury. Our coin bonds were sought for. The rate of interest was reduced. The Treasury was overflowing. Resumption was made easy. The public credit was good, and better than ever before, and President Hayes stated the facts and figures supporting it in his messages.

The Bland-Allison Act was passed over the veto of President Hayes, who wanted our "public indebtedness" paid in gold. In his veto message, as in his former messages, he said in effect that to remonetize silver would destroy the business of the country and to pay our bonds with silver dollars was "an act of bad faith." In vetoing the Bland-Allison law President Hayes said:

The right to pay duties in silver or in certificates for silver deposits will, when they are issued in sufficient amounts to circulate, put an end to the receipt of revenue in gold, and thus compel the payment of silver for both the principal and interest of the public debt. One billion one hundred and forty-three million four hundred and ninety-three thousand four hundred dollars of the bonded debt now outstanding was issued prior to February, 1873, when the silver dollar was unknown in circulation in this country and was only a convenient form of silver bullion for exportation; $583,440,350 of the funded debt has been issued since February, 1873, when gold alone was the coin for which the bonds were sold, and gold alone was the coin in which both parties to the contract understood that the bonds would be paid. The sum of $225,000,000 of these bonds has been sold during my Administration for gold coin.

In the face of the fact that this $1,143,493,400 of bonds were issued prior to 1873, when the old silver dollar was unknown in circulation, but still open to free coinage and a full tender, yet they were all coin bonds, not gold bonds only, or silver bonds only, but coin bonds. In the face of the fact that $583,440,350 of the funded debt was issued since 1873, and before the Bland-Allison law was passed and when the silver-dollar coinage was stopped, still they were coin bonds, not gold only or silver only, but coin bonds, and payable in gold and silver, or both, or some of each. And in the face of the further fact that $225,000,000 of these bonds were sold after 1873, as President Hayes said, for gold coin, they, too, were made coin bonds, not gold only or silver only, but coin bonds. Now, it would have been easy for Congress, particularly from 1873 to 1878, to have said, by law, as you are now trying to say, that these bonds were payable alone in gold; in fact, making the bond payable on its face in gold; but it did not. And why not? Because the Government rightfully reserved to itself the alternative which the term "coin" gave—that is, to pay in either coin, or both, whichever was easiest, cheapest, and best to be paid at the time.

But now this alternative is being surrendered, so that the Government will be compelled to pay in gold only, regardless of whether it has gold on hand at the time of payment or not. More bonds will be issued and sold for gold, with which to keep up these endless gold payments and satiate the money ghouls "run" on his country's Treasury.

In the face of the prophecies that dire destruction would follow to the business of the country if silver was remonetized, we find

President Hayes, on the 30th of October, 1878, in his Thanksgiving proclamation, saying:

Exuberant harvests, productive mines, ample crops of the staples of trade and manufactures have enriched the country. The resources thus furnished to our reviving industry and expanding commerce are hastening the day when discords and distresses through the length and breadth of the land will, under the continued favor of Providence, have given way to confidence and energy and assured prosperity.

President Hayes, in his last annual message, December 6, 1880, says:

The condition of the financial affairs of the Government, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, is very satisfactory. It is believed that the present financial situation of the United States, whether considered with respect to trade, currency, credit, growing wealth, or the extent and variety of our resources, is more favorable than that of any other country of our time, and has never been surpassed by that of any country at any period of its history. All our industries are thriving. The rate of interest is low. New railroads are being constructed. A vast immigration is increasing our population, capital, and labor. New enterprises in great number are in progress, and our commercial relations with other countries are improving.

He further says:

The continuance of specie payments has not been interrupted or endangered since the date of resumption. It has contributed greatly to the revival of business and to our remarkable prosperity. The fears that preceded and accompanied resumption have proved groundless. No considerable amount of United States notes have been presented for redemption, while very large sums of gold bullion, both domestic and imported, are taken to the mints and exchanged for coin or notes. The increase of coin and bullion in the United States since January 1, 1879, is estimated at $27,300,428.

December 7, 1878, in his annual message, President Hayes says:

We are at peace with all other nations. Our public credit has greatly improved, and is now perhaps stronger than ever before. Abundant harvests have rewarded the labors of those who till the soil, our manufacturing industries are reviving, and it is believed that general prosperity, which has been so long anxiously looked for, is at last within our reach.

In this same message President Hayes says by its terms—that is, by the act of February 25, 1862—the public debt should have been reduced between 1862 and the close of the last fiscal year, June, 1878, $518,361,806.28; the actual reduction of the ascertained debt in that period has been $720,644,720.61, being in excess of the reduction required by the sinking-fund act, $202,282,913.33.

The amount of the public debt, less cash in the Treasury, November 1, 1878, was $2,024,200,083.18, a reduction since the same date of the last year of $23,150,617.39.

In the face of this happy result of the remonetization the President adds this:

The progress made during the last year in refunding the public debt at lower rates of interest is very gratifying. The amount of 4 per cent bonds sold during the present year, prior to November 23, 1878, is $1,270,000, and 6 per cent bonds, commonly known as five-twenties, to an equal amount have been or will be reduced as calls mature.

The President stated that the gold coinage for the last fiscal year was $52,798,980, and the silver dollars coined under the act of February 28, 1878, to the 23d of November, amounted to $19,814,550. He then continues:

With views unchanged in regard to the act under which the coinage of silver proceeds, it has been the purpose of the Secretary faithfully to execute the law and to afford a fair trial to the measure.

And we see the happy results of a faithful execution of the law. He then continues:

In the present financial condition of the country I am persuaded that the welfare of legitimate business and industry of every description will be best promoted by abstaining from all attempts to make radical changes in the existing financial legislation.

On the 3d of November, 1879, President Hayes, in his Thanksgiving proclamation, said:

At no recurrence of the season which the devout habit of a religious people has made the occasion for giving thanks to Almighty God and humbly invoking His continued favor has the material prosperity enjoyed by our whole country been more conspicuous, more manifold, or more universal.

Again, on December 1, 1879, the President begins his message at a period, as he said—calling for mutual congratulation and grateful acknowledgment to the Giver of all good for the large and unusual measure of national prosperity which we now enjoy. The most interesting events which have occurred in our public affairs since my last annual message to Congress are connected with the financial operations of the Government, directly affecting the business interests of the country. I congratulate Congress on the successful execution of the resumption act. At the time fixed, and in the manner contemplated by law, United States notes began to be redeemed in coin.

Since the 1st of January last they have been promptly redeemed on presentation, and in all business transactions, public and private, in all parts of the country, they are received and paid out as the equivalent of coin. The demand upon the Treasury for gold and silver in exchange for United States notes has been comparatively small, and the voluntary deposit of coin and bullion in exchange for notes has been very large. The excess of the precious metals deposited or exchanged for United States notes over the amount of United States notes redeemed is about $40,000,000.

The resumption of specie payments has been followed by a very great revival of business. With a currency equivalent in value to the money of the commercial world, we are enabled to enter upon an equal competition with other nations in trade and production.

Further on in his message the President says:

Since the resumption of specie payments there has also been a marked and gratifying improvement of the public credit. The bonds of the Government bearing only 4 per cent interest have been sold at or above par sufficient in amount to pay off all of the national debt which was redeemable under present laws. The amount of interest saved annually by the process of refunding the debt since March 1, 1877, is $14,297,177. The bonds sold were largely in small sums, and the number of our citizens now holding the public securities is much greater than ever before.

The amount of the national debt which matures within less than two years is $792,121,700, of which $500,000,000 bears interest at the rate of 5 per cent, and the balance is in bonds bearing 6 per cent interest. It is believed that this part of the public debt can be refunded by the issue of 4 per cent bonds, and, by the reduction of interest which will thus be effected, about $11,000,000 can be annually saved to the Treasury. To secure this important reduction of interest to be paid by the United States further legislation is required, which, it is hoped, will be provided by Congress during its present session. The coinage of gold by the mints of the United States during the last fiscal year was $40,986,912. The coinage of silver dollars since the passage of the act for that purpose up to November 1, 1879, was $45,000,850, of which $12,700,344 have been issued from the Treasury and are now in circulation and $32,300,506 are still in the possession of the Government.

President Hayes, in his Thanksgiving proclamation of November 1, 1880, says:

At no period in their history since the United States became a nation has this people had so abundant and so universal reasons for joy and gratitude at the favor of Almighty God or been subject to so profound an obligation to give thanks for His loving-kindness and humbly to implore His continued care and protection. Health, wealth, and prosperity throughout all our borders; peace, honor, and friendship with all the world; firm and faithful adherence by the great body of our population to the principles of liberty and justice which have made our greatness as a nation, and the wise institutions and strong frame of government and society which will perpetuate it—all these let the thanks of a happy and united people as with one voice ascend in devout homage to the Giver of All Good.

If such a condition of our public credit and condition of the people as President Hayes states existed throughout his term of four years is to be called a period of "ills," I am at a loss to know what a prosperous era is.

APPENDIX.

Money question reviewed by Percy Kinnaird, of the Nashville bar—1897.

The cupidity and rascality of certain classes in this country since its first settlement have brought evil and disaster upon the people and tended to overthrow and change the theory and form of our Government. On the other hand, the practical wisdom of the people, as expressed in experiments of the Government, has demonstrated what is the correct method of issuing money. Each has, at different periods, had their turn in issuing money, and though the first-named class, with bank notes, has always succeeded in entailing loss and disaster upon the people and it has been imperative for the Government to issue Treasury notes to repair this loss and save the property of the people, the Government has grown none the wiser.

Notwithstanding the number of times the Government has been forced to issue Treasury notes to protect the people from serious loss and to preserve its very existence, and which has demonstrated that the sole motive for issuing money was to subserve in the highest degree the interest of the people by accommodating them in the easy exchange of their products, so soon as this has been accomplished bank notes have invariably returned and driven the Treasury notes out of circulation. The sole motive for the issue of money should be to accommodate in the highest degree the exchange of products among the people.

Whenever money has been issued for this purpose alone and made a legal tender or solvent of debts, both public and private, it has invariably served the interests of the entire people with the highest efficiency until it received the blow of hostile legislation of those who desired to substitute their bank notes in the place of the Treasury notes.

Whenever money has professedly been issued to accommodate the people in making their exchanges, and has only been made a legal tender in part, viz, for public, not private, debts, the friends of bank notes have always refused to receive it and in some instances have influenced the Government not to receive it, and thus forced it to a discount, and then demanded its retirement and the issue of bank notes. If it is conceded, as it must be, that the basic idea and dominant motive for the issue of money at all is the purpose to accommodate the people in making the exchange of their products, then certainly it should never be lost sight of or departed from in the formation of a financial system.

As civilization expands the country enlarges, population increases, and exchanges become intricate and on a magnitude that forces the abandonment of cash transactions. We are compelled to realize that this condition of affairs has to be met and provided for.

This is a natural and advantageous growth in the affairs of humanity that everyone should welcome and encourage with voice and hand, but not if it is at the expense of any portion of the people from the abuses of governmental legislation.

If a people can grow into the development above described with advantage to themselves, the country, and to humanity, it is well and good; but if this growth is at the expense of the many and enriches the few, creating distinctive and noxious class interests, threatening to the peace of society, it were well to discover the cause and remedy it before revolution, as it will, cures or makes worse the evil.

It may truthfully be said that the growth of the issue of money in a country is the growth of its civilization and that in this sense "moral growth is real growth; moral decay is real decay." Applying this thought, if a correct one, to the civilization of this country, and the inclination is strong to examine into the growth of our financial system and ascertain wherein and in what particulars it has taken on the excrecences that engendered all the corruption of that enhanced class interest which has grown so bold and shameless in its determination to keep what it has appropriated.

It is easily seen that under an advanced civilization the exchange of products that could not possibly be made by barter and trade could easily be made with a legal-tender currency. It is also easily seen that as population increased and the diversity of occupations enlarged the growth of cities would project the completion of large contracts into the future and create the debtor and creditor classes. Under this condition there was cash payments and future payments to be made in cash or credit. In both these instances actual cash payments were made. As the number of people increased and exchange of products became more intricate notes, bills, and drafts were used, but final settlements were made with the actual use of legal-tender money.

Finally there came a time in the transactions of this country, as is the case with all countries of advanced civilization and great power, when the magnitude of exchange made it a physical impossibility to transact business in the expectation or with the idea of making settlements with the actual use of legal-tender money. The only way in which business of this magnitude could be carried on at all was by a system of "bookkeeping" that had grown up in keeping an intelligent record of the manifold and almost innumerable variations of the daily, monthly, and yearly transactions which were taking place in the different parts of the country, and in some cases throughout the world, or wherever man went in his propensity to trade.

This system of "bookkeeping" is called the "credit system," as contradistinguished from all other methods of making exchanges, and should never be confused with credit.

The distinction between the "credit system" and all other modes of making exchanges and payments for same commences at that point where the settlement of balances and the liquidation of accounts in legal-tender money is an annoyance and undue expense in the actual handling of legal-tender money.

Just here lies the error of our present financial system. Notwithstanding the magnitude of many business interests in every State in the Union, and especially in the East and the more immediate Western States, has long been such that it is ridiculous to think of them handling legal-tender money in their business, except in the limited use that may be made to pay current expense, and that their business is conducted necessarily by the "credit system," or the "bookkeeping" theory, yet in contemplation of law all that vast and almost inconceivable volume of exchange of products is payable finally in legal-tender money.

Consequently whenever the ringleaders in this country or in Europe want to, for holy or unholy purpose, they make the demand for cash payments and precipitate a catastrophe that the Government is unable to ward off, even if the public officials attitudinizing as servants of the people were not the agents and tools of the ringleaders.

The growth of the business of this country has long since reached such proportions in many lines that the individual is completely barred.

It has been given over to chartered companies, and as it increased, the possibilities under our financial system and legislation are such that trusts and combines are naturally entered into with a purpose of complete absorption of that business.

The individual is thus driven from one field of employment to another and is fast becoming so restricted in his opportunities that he is being rapidly reduced to the condition of a wage slave more intolerable than that of chattel slavery. If the business of the country in many instances has grown to such proportions that it is ridiculous to think of their payments and settlements being made in the actual use of legal-tender money, and the use of such plebeian methods are not even contemplated in their business affairs, why should it not be separated from and made independent of a system that is the lifeblood of the business of the people?

They laugh and jeer at the idea that it makes any difference whether there is much or little money in circulation, claiming that only 4 per cent of the volume of all business is carried on by money, and the balance, 96 per cent, by the "credit system."

They deride the idea that if the volume of money is reduced it makes any difference, claiming that if you give much for it, either in labor or products, it will reimburse you when you part with it for the equivalent of what it cost you.

They claim that they have little or no use for money, because the bulk of their transactions are carried on by the "credit system," and that there is plenty of money to carry on the cash transactions, which are only 4 per cent of the volume of business.

If this is so and they do not need and do not use actual cash in their business, which is 96 per cent of the volume of all business, it is a false policy to leave the system so that at any time they want to they can demand the payment of this 96 per cent of the volume of all business in actual legal-tender money, and thereby precipitate a financial catastrophe that they call an object lesson.

The only way to disarm them and take this powerful engine of oppression from their use is to separate the "credit system" from cash and credits.

This would leave both systems to be used by those who use the "credit system" and secure cash and credit to the actual users of money, undisturbed by the rascality and manipulation of those who use the "credit system." But so long as the people can be cajoled into maintaining the present system that fleeces the money class the enjoyment of the "credit system," and in addition the right and power to formulate, control, and direct the money system, with the added power, at any hour, to demand the payment of all their vast business and indebtedness in actual legal-tender money, the conversion of the property and products of the people will go forward until in the near future they will be the masters and the people serfs.

This separation of the "credit system" from the system wherein there is actual use of money, and taking away from the "credit system" the right to demand legal-tender money whenever cupidity may incline, has been done in the history of the race (notably in the Bank of Venice), and can and will be done again when statesmen and not the mere politicians are at the helm. Not satisfied with this control and domination over the volume of business and the method and manner of payments, they demand the right to issue their bank notes in the place of the greenbacks and the silver dollars, and they deny the right of the Government to issue money direct to the people.

This right to issue bank notes is maintained to-day by the threat to demand payment in legal-tender money of the vast indebtedness due them, and whenever and at such times as Congress attempts to pass contrary legislation, the call for payment in legal tender in vast amounts is made, precipitating in embryo a catastrophe that is termed an object lesson, and which is relieved so soon as Congress has been deterred from acting in the interest of the people. There was one of these object lessons in 1893, when it was decided to force Congress to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law and cease the coinage of silver, and there will be another and more serious one this year in the attempt that will be made to induce Congress to retire the greenbacks and silver dollars and pass a banking law. To determine how this will be of advantage, and why it is regarded as so necessary, can be best shown by a cursory examination of the history and growth of the issues of money in this country.

It is unnecessary to consider the first two hundred and fifty years of our financial experiments, except to state that it consisted of all forms of barter and the use of the most primitive kinds of money; that as the country gradually took on the forms and assumed the manners of a higher civilization, it enlarged its purchases from Europe. This required the use on the part of the colonist of the same money that was current in Europe, and the demands for the metals became imperative.

This demand for metal money first affected Massachusetts, because of its higher advancement in civilization, and in 1649 that State, in order that it might secure the needed coins, demonetized heads that had been legal tender.

So great was the necessity at that time for metal money that the people of that State were glad of an opportunity to open up business relations with the buccaneers of the Spanish main.

This association of the much-lauded Puritan with the buccaneers of the Spanish main to secure a full supply of metal money did not secure enough for foreign use and local purposes, and in 1690 they were compelled to issue $5,000 of paper money. This was forced upon the State after the return of an unsuccessful expedition against the French in Canada.

The soldiers had come back without any spoils of war, were in a miserable condition, and so clamorous for their pay that this paper money had to be issued. It was made redeemable in any stock at any time that might be in the treasury, and for twenty years it circulated at par until it was redeemed. In 1708 Massachusetts made a second issue of $75,000 of paper money that was made a legal tender for private debt.

In 1716, $750,000 more of paper money was authorized to be issued on real-estate security for ten years at 5 per cent interest.

In 1720, $250,000 more was issued.

During this time South Carolina, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Maryland, Delaware, and some of the other colonies under similar pressure for money for local need that the metals might be used in foreign trade had also issued paper money, and in most instances it was made a legal tender.

The Bank of England was organized in 1691, and in 1723 it suspended payment.

In its preparation and effort to resume the coin of the American colonies was needed and it was drawn across the ocean in the same peremptory manner that the East has drawn the coin out of the South and West since 1893 to keep their banks from suspending.

All the coin left Pennsylvania, though the colony passed laws raising its value. It was therefore forced in 1723 to issue treasury notes to supply the demand for local currency, and the notes were made a legal tender and redeemable only in payment of taxes. In 1740, notwithstanding the previous issues, the necessity for additional money was such that the colony of Massachusetts endeavored to secure more currency by establishing a land bank. It was denied this right by the governor of the colony, who claimed that it was unlawful and pernicious, contrary to the act of Parliament, and to his instructions.

The people of Massachusetts were beginning to feel the iron hand of the financiers of England, and in their extremity they laid aside their Puritan principles, called to their aid the characteristics of their buccaneering ancestors, and in 1745 made a predatory incursion upon the French and captured Lewisburg, on Cape Breton, which they despoiled.

The British Parliament so highly approved this exhibition of their buccaneering propensities dominating the heretical puritanic convictions that it ransomed Lewisburg from the colony, paying therefor a large sum of silver and copper.

Thereupon the colony of Massachusetts (that had received but small assistance from the other colonies), with the greater share of this ransom money, announced the intention of paying off her paper money and going to a sound-money basis.

This action of Massachusetts had the effect of drawing a large part of the trade of the other colonies to its market, and consequently was calculated to depreciate the value of the paper issues of the other colonies.

It was most disastrous to New Hampshire and Rhode Island on account of their proximity.

This loss of their trade checked their progress, lessened the demand for the use of their paper money, deprived them of the specie that it would have brought them, and the natural consequence was that the value of specie increased and their paper money was forced to a discount.

This was Massachusetts' first taste of the blood of humanity, drawn by financial buccaneering, and not with the buccaneer's sword and its attendant dangers, and was so much more in consonance with their professed puritanical principles that they have followed it every since.

The people realized fully the advantage that had accrued to them and the colony from the ransom money of the despoiled city and the use they had made of it at the expense of their sister colonies, and indifferent then as now and as they have ever been to the wail of suffering humanity, if it was caused by schemes that advance their prosperity and increase their wealth, does anyone doubt that they began secretly to influence the financiers of the Bank of England that the colonies ought not to be allowed to issue paper money?

From the use and enjoyment of a full supply of legal-tender paper money from 1690 to 1745, and then the capture, despoilment, and sale of a city, assisted by the method in which they used their ill-gotten gains at the expense of their sister colonies, the people of Massachusetts succeeded in clearing up their sterile and rocky lands and were far advanced on the road to material prosperity and riches.

Appreciating, as they must, the disadvantages they had suffered from and labored under so long in their trade relations with England and the necessity there was for them to secure sufficient metal money at any and all cost to carry on trade at home and abroad, and fully realizing that a full supply of legal-tender paper money for local use was the main cause of their success, it would naturally be supposed that solicitude for the younger, weaker, and struggling colonies would have prompted them to take no action that would injure or be detrimental to their sister colonies.

On the contrary, however, they at once proceeded to use the specie they had received for looting a city to go to a sound-money basis, conscious of the fact that in so doing they were applying to the other colonies similar impositions to those England had so inhumanly applied to them. From that time to this at first Massachusetts, and subsequently the East, has preyed and fattened off of the South and the West as it came into existence.

Going to a specie basis and the consequent despoilment of the other colonies of a large portion of their trade inured so much to the benefit of Massachusetts that by 1773 that colony had paid off all its paper money and debts and was on a specie basis.

The effect upon the other colonies was that their trade had decreased, their debts had increased, their paper money was at a discount, and they had to borrow from the people of Massachusetts.

This had been caused to a great extent by an act of Parliament in 1751, prohibiting the colonies from issuing paper money.

This prohibitive act seems to have had only the effect intended, that of depreciating the value of paper money and increasing the trade of specie-paying Massachusetts, for it appears that Virginia first issued paper money in 1755, notwithstanding the act.

This failure on the part of the colonies to obey the act of 1751, as Massachusetts was doing in gradually retiring her paper issues because it was to her interest, caused the British Board of Trade, in 1764, to object to the use of legal-tender paper money by the colonies, on the ground that "every medium of exchange should have an intrinsic value, which paper had not."

The British Board of Trade, the financiers of the Bank of England, and the people of Massachusetts finally succeeded, and in 1773 Parliament passed an act that took away from the colonies their representative money, commanded that no more paper money should be issued and that they should cease to be a legal tender, and demanded payment of taxes in silver.

This contraction of the currency paralyzed all the industries of the people. "Ruin seized upon these once flourishing colonies; the most severe distress was brought home to every interest and family; discontent was urged on to desperation, till at last 'human nature,' as Dr. Johnson phrases it, 'arose and asserted its rights.'" Thomas Pownall, M. P., of England, who had acted as governor and commander in chief of all the provinces, in a book written by him in 1768, says in regard to this colonial system of money: "In a country under such circumstances money lent to settlers creates money. Paper money thus lent upon interest will create gold and silver principal, while the interest becomes a revenue that pays the charges of the government. This currency is the true Pactolean stream which converts all into gold that is washed by it."

The desperation caused by this destruction of the colonial currency, and which contracted the volume of currency to such an extent that all enterprise perished, and the realization that the colonists would soon lose all their possessions and virtually become serfs of the English money lenders, brought on the Revolution. The English owners of gold and silver, in the folly of their mad avarice and the false assumption that if Massachusetts could go to a specie basis the other colonies could also, made the Revolution a certainty by the following act of Parliament passed in 1775, viz: "That all promissory or other notes, bills of exchange, or drafts, or undertakings in writing, being negotiable or transferable, for the payment of any sum or sums of money less than the sum of 20 shillings in the whole, shall be, and the same are hereby, declared to be absolutely void and of no effect."

Two years after this was followed by an act extending these provisions to all sums under £5. This was going to a hard-money basis with a vengeance.

The poor man was denied the right to make any trade to be paid in the future, but was forced to pay in cash in all transactions under $5 at first, and subsequently in all transactions under $25. This was too much for Massachusetts even. A sound-money basis of her own selection—and that was a good scheme for her people, although at the expense of her sister colonists—was well enough, but when she realized that all the transactions of her people under $5 must be in cash, and appreciated that a specie basis of that kind was detrimental to her interests, they were keen for the fighting to commence.

Therefore, when the English officials demanded of the people of Massachusetts the stamp tax upon the tea in specie, after they had made the use of specie a necessity in all local trades under $5, they realized, in the scarcity of specie, that English greed had outwitted them, and that they were going to be deprived of all the gains they had hoped to make off their sister colonies in going to a specie basis.

Thoroughly enraged that English greed should gather the inhuman profits they were willing to take from the other colonists, their inherited buccaneering courage backed up their Puritan ideas of independence and freedom, and they threw the tea into the sea, declaring undying war to the tyrants.

Ostensibly the people of Massachusetts fought for independence and freedom from love of liberty and patriotism, but it was the freedom and liberty to despoil the other colonies it fought for, unrestrained and without fear of English interference.

This is clearly evidenced in the influence of that colony as to the manner of the issuance of paper money to fight the war of the Revolution; in the action of its delegates in framing the financial part of the Constitution; in the action of her public men in and out of Congress ever since in all financial legislation, and in the attitude of its people at the present time, demanding bank notes and the gold basis.

In preparing for the war the act of June 25, 1775, passed by the provisional government authorized the issue of $2,000,000 in notes that read as follows: "This note entitles the bearer to receive—Spanish milled dollars, or the value thereof in gold or silver, according to the resolution of the 10th of May, 1775."

Entering actively upon preparation for war with Great Britain because the acts of Parliament in 1773 and 1775 had forced them to a specie basis when, according to the best estimate, the colonies only had five millions of gold and silver, they are guilty of the fatal error of issuing six millions in notes redeemable in gold and silver.

In their ignorance of finances, or from ulterior motives of some powerful and sinister influence, their first issue of money inflicts upon the people the very grievance that was driving them to war with Great Britain. This manner of issuing notes was not the Pennsylvania method inaugurated by Franklin and of which Thomas Pownall thought so favorably.

It was not the method of the colonies that made the notes a legal tender for all debts, public and private, and made them redeemable in taxes.

It was not the method which provides and arranges for a safe, full, and acceptable money for local uses and makes it possible to have all the gold and silver for trade with foreign nations that Massachusetts had availed itself of from 1690 to 1773.

But it was the buccaneering policy of Massachusetts glossed over with hypocritical Puritan professions of patriotism and love of liberty that she thought had been fastened upon her sister colonists at the time she went to a sound-money basis. They were not made a legal tender in payment of public or private dues. After the war was over her delegates were instrumental in having the power denied to the States and withheld from Congress of emitting bills of credit or paper money and giving to Congress only the right to coin gold and silver.

The result of this has been that whenever money was needed banks have been given the right to issue notes, and the country has through all its history been afflicted with their worthless issues.

Whenever new territory was settled and money was needed, as Massachusetts did in her early days, instead of being able to do as Massachusetts did for such a while and so advantageously, they have been forced to borrow from Massachusetts and the East, until the East in this manner has absorbed nearly all the surplus wealth of the South and West. Her public men were instrumental in demonetizing silver and repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, with the purpose of enhancing the value of the debt due Massachusetts that was forced upon the people of the South and West in being forced to borrow money of her people.

Her public men and people to-day are active and vociferous in demanding the retirement of the greenbacks, the withdrawal from circulation of all silver dollars, and the adoption of the gold standard in order that a banking law may be passed, so that they can issue their notes in the place of the greenbacks and the silver dollar.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I find an interview in the Washington Post this morning that purports to have been had with Mr. W. J. Bryan, now at Austin, Tex., on the subject of the bill before the House, and he closes the interview as follows:

It should certainly never be permitted to pass the House, because it is not in the interest of Democracy.

I have heard the criticism made by the gentleman who has taken his seat as to the manner in which this bill is before us. It seems to me it would be higher statesmanship on the part of gentlemen on the other side to discuss the effect of this bill on the country rather than its effect either upon the Republican or Democratic party. I propose to attempt to discuss it in that way. The discussion on my part will necessarily be a dry one, and I ask the considerate attention of the House for a while.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One moment—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman read an interview, and I think inadvertently. As I read it, Mr. Bryan said it was because it was not in the interest of the people.

Mr. HILL. This interview says because it is not in the interest of Democracy.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman from Connecticut read the whole interview?

Mr. HILL. I have practically. I shall have to ask not to be interrupted, because my time will not allow me to complete my remarks.

Webster's Dictionary gives several definitions of the word "standard;" one, "That which is established as a rule or model by respectable authority, by custom, or by general consent;" another, with relation to coinage, "The proportion of weight of fine metal and alloy established by authority."

Our coinage law uses it in the latter sense only, and as such it is applied to the quality or fineness of both gold and silver alike, declaring "that the standard for both gold and silver coins shall be such that of 1,000 parts by weight 900 shall be pure metal and 100 of alloy." But it adds "that the one-dollar piece, at the standard weight of 25.8 grains of gold, shall be the unit of value."

The law of 1878 provides for the coinage of a silver dollar of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver, but it nowhere makes this another unit or measure of value.

By common usage in the political discussions of the past three years the word "standard" has been applied to the metal and not to the fineness or quality of the metal, and, singularly enough, in the title of the bill under consideration, as well as in the Senate bill, the word is used with its broader meaning, referring to the basis of our financial system, and then in the first section of both bills in a restricted or specific sense, describing a peculiar characteristic of that basis and defining certain conditions which shall pertain to it.

I think it is this double use of the term standard rather than any ambiguity of the law itself which has caused doubt to exist in the minds of so many of our people as to the legal status of the measure of value in this country.

There is no question whatever that under the law since 1873 the only standard unit of value here has been, and is now, the gold dollar, consisting of 25.8 grains of standard gold or 23.22 grains of pure gold, and the fact that a silver dollar is a legal tender under certain conditions does not make it another standard unit of value any more than it makes a dollar greenback possessing larger legal-tender qualities a standard unit of value also.

Both of these are only means of payment or commercial tools, but both must be measured by the established unit of gold.

The purpose of this bill is not to fix another unit, or, using the common acceptance of the term, to establish another standard, but rather, at the demand of the people of the country, to recognize and emphasize the one we have and provide some way by which all of our currency and our whole commercial system shall be put and kept in accord with it.

That gold has been the touchstone, as it were, by which all other things have been tested from the earliest recorded times needs no argument now, and that as civilization has advanced to higher planes gold has by its inherent qualities demonstrated its superiority to everything else as a medium of exchange is beyond dispute.

The only question remaining is whether it now exists in quantities sufficient to be the only medium of exchange throughout the world, for if all forms of money are made exchangeable for it at the will of the holder it thus becomes the universal solvent.

This was disputed in this country three years ago, and even now the arguments then advanced are coining out at intervals to sustain a dying cause; but while the controversy has been going on the miner's pick and dynamite have solved the problem, and to-day 89 per cent of all international trade is settled by the use of gold.

The question now is, Is there enough for us; and if so, how can we best use it as our medium of exchange in our domestic trade?

I do not use the word "enough" as in any way connected with the quantitative theory of money, for I do not accept that theory; but I mean enough, together with the other instruments of trade, to conveniently provide for the necessities of to-day.

Six years ago our silver friends said that gold and silver both were needed as redemption money, and the commercial value of the world's product of both was then $280,055,900.

In 1898 the product of gold alone was $287,428,600, and in the past six years, from 1893 to 1898, $1,267,271,100 have been added to the world's constantly accumulating supply of an imperishable money metal.

I have often thought that our timid bimetallic friends believed, or acted as if they did, that the crop of gold, like the world's food supply, was wholly consumed each year, instead of accumulating as it has through all the ages; but the proof is clear and plain that the great bulk of gold produced goes into and remains in money use.

The known, visible holdings of gold in the banks and treasuries of twenty-two countries of Europe increased from 1893 to 1898, inclusive, $603,323,711.

Of this increase they lost in 1898 $190,025,073, but it was almost wholly from the Russian Imperial Bank and treasury, and was, in the process of gold resumption, distributed among the Russian people. But Mr. De Witte, the Russian minister of finance, says in his annual report that "there has been an actual increase in the general amount of gold in the country during the year 1898."

Assuming that this is correct, and adding the known increase to the stock of gold in the United States for six years prior to the 1st of July, 1899, which was $365,800,699, and we have accounted in these countries alone for $969,124,410 increased money supply out of the world's product of a little over twelve hundred millions in these six years.

But why weary the members of this House with dry statistics to prove that which even the casual observer of the world's progress now admits—namely, that the gold supply is rapidly approaching, if it has not already reached, the point where it meets the necessities and convenience of the world?

How is it in the United States?

In 1873 the per capita stock of money was $21.36, being $3.24 of gold, 15 cents of silver, and $17.97 of paper. On December 1, 1899, it consisted of $1,018,133,308 in gold, or $13.25 per capita; $644,491,750 in silver, or $8.38 per capita; $590,523,084 in paper, counting no certificates or Treasury notes, or a per capita of $7.68; making a total of $2,253,148,047, or a per capita of $29.31, of which 45 per cent is gold and 55 per cent is silver and paper, which we propose by exchangeability to make and keep as good as gold.

This is the task which we have undertaken, and it is a tremendous one.

That its greatness may be more clearly understood, let me call the attention of the House to the fact that, according to the latest statistics which I have, in 1897 the monetary stock of Great Britain consisted of 73 per cent of gold and 28 per cent of silver and paper; of France, 58 per cent of gold and 42 per cent of silver and paper; of Germany, 66 per cent of gold and 34 per cent of silver and paper.

Since adopting the gold standard, Germany has reduced her per capita of silver from $7.47 to $4.07, in 1897, and now she is about to recoin the greater part of her legal-tender silver into subsidiary coin.

She has found her burden, though small compared with ours, too great for her to carry. When the bullion in the Treasury is all coined, as is now being done under the law, we shall have $601,339,276 of legal-tender silver.

In the presence of this distinguished company of financiers, for we can all be thus classified this week, I hesitate even to offer a suggestion; but is it not a serious question whether, in time of panic, or with the balance of trade running strongly against us, or with a deficit in our Treasury, we can maintain gold redemption and exchangeability of gold with silver, unless some permanent disposition of the greenbacks is made and more rigid methods provided for holding our excessive volume of silver in circulation as change money among the people?

I shall vote for this bill with great pleasure, for, even as it is, it is far in advance of any former step taken by this House, and gives great promise for the future; but the country is calling for mandatory provisions where this bill allows discretion, and is demanding that the question of the maintenance of parity shall be so definitely settled now that it will require the united action of the Executive and both Houses of Congress ever to disturb or break it.

In September last I was present at the annual meeting of the American Bankers' Association at Cleveland, an organization representing a very large proportion of the State banks, trust companies, and national banks of the country and attended by more than a thousand delegates, representing nearly every State and Territory. This resolution was passed unanimously:

Resolved, That the bankers of the United States most earnestly recommend that the Congress of the United States at its next session enact a law to establish more firmly and unequivocally the gold standard in this country by providing that the gold dollar, which under the existing law is the unit of value, shall be the standard and measure of all values in the United States; that all obligations of the Government and all paper money, including the circulating notes of national banks, shall be redeemed in gold coin, and the legal-tender notes of the United States, when paid into the Treasury, shall not be reissued except upon the deposit of an equivalent amount of gold coin.

Mark the language. The banks themselves demand that their own notes shall be redeemable in gold, and that Government notes once coming in for redemption or paid in in the ordinary course of business shall not be reissued except upon the deposit of an equivalent amount of gold coin, making practically gold certificates of every one of them.

This done, and your silver given the whole field of change money by the limit of $10 placed upon circulating notes, your endless chain would be broken, and bond issues would be unnecessary if a Republican Administration and excess revenues continued for another four years.

Oh, that the timidity of the legislator might give place to the courage and confidence of the people of this land!

Nevertheless I rejoice in voting for this bill, for it makes every obligation for the payment of money an obligation to pay gold or its equivalent, and that puts the poor man's wage and the bondholder's coupon upon an equal footing.

It writes upon the face of every life-insurance policy and across the cover of every savings-bank book "Payable in gold."

While it means lower interest rates on mortgages and bonds, it means larger dividends on stocks, for every currency obligation will be gold, and the accumulated capital of the Old World will be drawn to the fixed investments of the New, so that the money now locked up in waterworks, sewers, completed railroad construction, and public works of all kinds where the necessity for employing labor is exhausted can be transmuted into live capital for new construction and further development and the employment of the home capital at greater profit in untold risks.

It will open up new mines, build more ships, dig more canals, and do more than any other one thing to render permanent the prosperity which abounds to-day.

A few months ago I received a letter from a gentleman in Connecticut, from which I wish to quote as touching this point:

The people are constantly calling for more money, but at the same time some of them are doing their utmost quite effectually to lessen the volume, as may be seen from the following facts: Early in September in London I asked one of the largest dealers in money in the world why England did not take all of the stocks in the market of such character as St. Paul preferred, New York Central, New York and New Haven, and those of other first-class roads that would net more than 4 per cent interest, instead of investing in European securities that pay less than 3 per cent. His reply was, "Because they are currency obligations, and Europe is still in doubt whether the basis of the currency of the United States is to be gold or silver. The London market is destitute of American railway shares of an investment character. They have all been sold and sent home, and had I an order to buy them I should be obliged to fill it in New York."

The day I left Liverpool for home one of the finance committee of the Liverpool, London, and Globe Insurance Company, a gentleman who knows this country well, told me it was useless to suggest in committee a large investment in American securities, "because of the danger of silver legislation; remove that danger and hundreds—yes, thousands—of millions of European money would come like a flood for investment."

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, section 2 of this bill removes that danger by declaring that every obligation for the payment of money shall be discharged with gold or its equivalent, and I do not propose to quibble now over the details of sections 3 and 4, for behind this declaration will stand the majesty, the honor, and the conscience of 75,000,000 of people, who will demand under all political changes that the spirit as well as the letter of the law shall be enforced.

In dropping further consideration of this topic and passing to the banking features of the bill, may I not express the hope that the same unanimity of opinion that characterized the committee which had the honor of compiling this bill may, after more extended deliberation and before its final enactment into law, prompt them to eliminate all discretionary provisions and make the exchangeability of all forms of money at the will of the holder absolute, unequivocal, and mandatory, for I believe that the unquestioned maintenance of parity will irresistibly drive every Secretary who administers this law in good faith to precisely that course of action.

The pending bill, so far as it relates to banking, touches three subjects: First, increased circulation; second, taxation; third, minimum limit of capitalization.

During the past four years, whenever any proposition relating to national banks has come up for action in this House, I have noticed the remarkable unanimity which has characterized the unvarying opposition of the Democratic membership, and have wondered whether this antagonism was toward all banks or only to the national system.

In the attempt to solve the doubt I have briefly noted the declarations of that party in its national platforms since 1836 relating to banking and currency. They are as follows:

Platform of 1836:

We declare unqualified hostility to bank notes and paper money as a circulating medium, because gold and silver are the only safe and constitutional currency.

Platform of 1840:

Resolved, That Congress has no power to charter a United States bank.

Platform of 1844: Resolution of 1840 reaffirmed.

Platform of 1848: No expression.

Platform of 1852:

Resolved, That Congress has no power to charter a national bank, etc.

Platform of 1856: Same resolution reaffirmed.

Platform of 1860: Same resolution reaffirmed.

Platform of 1864: No resolution.

Platform of 1868:

One currency for the Government and the people, the laborer and the officeholder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bondholder.

Platform of 1872:

The public credit must be sacredly maintained, and we denounce repudiation in every form and guise. A speedy return to specie payment is demanded alike by the highest considerations of commercial morality and honest government.

Platform of 1876:

As such hindrance we denounce the resumption clause of the act of 1875, and we here demand its repeal.

Platform of 1880:

Honest money (the strict maintenance of the public faith), consisting of gold and silver and paper, convertible into coin on demand.

Platform of 1884:

We believe in honest money, the gold and silver coin of the Constitution, and a circulating medium convertible into such money without loss.

Platform of 1888: No currency resolution.

Platform of 1892:

We recommend that the prohibitory 10 per cent tax on State bank issues be repealed.

Platform of 1893:

Congress alone has the power to coin and issue money. We therefore demand that the power to issue notes to circulate as money be taken from the national banks and that all paper money shall be issued directly by the Treasury Department.

The only conclusion that I can draw from these declarations is that in its early youth the Democratic party was opposed to any form of paper money, and especially to bank-note issues.

In middle life and vigorous manhood it fell in love with State banks and note issues without limit or supervision, and now in its old age and declining years it demands that all paper money shall be issued directly by the Treasury Department, with no provision for payment except that it shall be receivable for public dues.

Is it not true in this, as in another historic case, that "the last state of that man is worse than the first?"

I have no authority to speak for anyone but myself, but my belief is that the only safe currency system for this country, or indeed for any country, is gold for its legal tender, a subsidiary coinage of silver for change money, and bank-note issues for commercial instruments; and all such notes should be issued by banks under the direct supervision and control of the General Government, and under such provisions of safety, either by the deposit of bonds or other guaranties, that there can be no possibility of loss to the holders thereof.

A government can not put money into circulation except in payment of debts already contracted, and when it pays with notes it has no returning stream of assets with which to meet them, for, while it often borrows, it never lends.

It can impose taxes, but can not adjust the time of payment to meet its notes, for, if they circulate as money, they must be on demand.

With a bank it is not so. It lends its credit in exchange for that of others, and for every dollar note that it puts out, at the time it does so it receives another back on which it expects to realize either on demand or at a fixed date in the future.

Again, the issue of notes by a government in payment of its debts has no relation to the business necessities of the people or the needs of trade, but a bank can only issue notes legitimately in response to commercial demands.

And yet we count a Government note as money, and in the statement of the condition of the United States Treasury, which the members of this House receive each day, millions of them are classed as cash on hand and counted as a part of the available cash balance, when, as a matter of fact, for every one put out a new obligation is at once created.

The absurdity of the whole thing is shown by the fact that a national bank is forbidden by law from counting its own notes as cash on hand, notwithstanding it has previously deposited with the Government its own bonds as security for their payment.

But the question here is, Shall a national bank be permitted to issue circulation within the limit of its capital to par of the bonds deposited as security?

The proposition is a plain one.

It is simply this: Will the United States accept its own bond of $100 as good security for $100 or only for $90?

Think for a moment what this means.

By the exercise of its taxing power, this Government says to its own people, "You shall not organize banks and issue notes unless you do it under the national banking system, and if you do it under that system you shall buy the bonds of the United States Government to a certain amount.

"We will not take less than $100 for a single bond, but when you have bought it we refuse to accept it as collateral security for more than $90."

What would be thought of an individual who had another in his power and made such a proposition as that to him?

I fancy that Shylock in his palmiest days never dreamed of such a bargain, even when the mosquitoes of Venice were singing him to sleep on the banks of the Grand Canal.

It would seem as though the simple statement of the proposition would be the best demonstration of its utter absurdity, and yet for thirty-five years this has been the effect of this law, and for all that time it has locked up millions of dollars of margin and premium that under any business treatment of the case would have been active working capital and used in developing the industrial and commercial resources of this nation.

Almost as much as the entire monetary stock of Canada and Mexico combined is lying idle here because this great Government still clings to the idea that its own bond is not absolutely safe for what it sells at.

It may not be known to all that the national-bank law, as originally drawn, February 25, 1863, provided for issuing circulation—equal in amount to 90 per cent of the current market value of the United States bonds, but not exceeding the par value thereof, if bearing interest at 6 per cent, or of equivalent United States bonds bearing a less rate of interest, but limited by the capital stock.

This provision remained in force until the act of June 3, 1864, which limited the issue of notes based on bonds bearing not less than 5 per cent interest to "not exceeding 90 per cent of the amount of said bonds at the par value thereof," and with this act began a series of attempts to fetter and control the banking capital of this country, every one of which has been a complete and total failure and most of which have been repealed.

Complaint is made to-day that the national-bank system does not measure up to the financial requirements of the times; that its note issues are insufficient and nonelastic; that it locks up capital instead of sending it out free and unencumbered to do its beneficent work, and in some respects the charge is true; but this is not due to the system itself, but rather to the miserable and senseless restrictions that have been placed upon it, which during all these years have held it as in a vise.

Twice it has come to the rescue of his nation—first, when it made a market for our bonds and supplied the means to carry on the war, and, second, when it made resumption possible, and gratitude alone should prompt at least a recognition of its usefulness.

In 1864 the limit of circulation was fixed at three hundred millions, when at that very time there were eighty-six millions of capital in the national and four hundred and five millions in the State bank system.

The minimum limit of capital stock was fixed and still remains at $50,000, and in 1865 the privilege of issuing notes was graded from 90 per cent down to 60 per cent, according to the capital of a bank.

This same year an attempt was made to distribute arbitrarily circulation among the States and Territories, which was about as effective in its results as the seed distribution was last year upon the crops of 1899.

In 1870 the amount was increased to three hundred and fifty-four millions and a redistribution attempted on the basis of the census of that year, and the limit for any one bank was fixed at $500,000.

Taxes were laid on deposits and circulation, and reserves of 15 per cent and 25 per cent ordered to be held against both.

Most of these restrictions proved to be total failures, and in 1875 the separate and aggregate limit and the provisions for the distribution were repealed, and now the only limit of capitalization of a bank is the necessities of commerce, and of circulation 90 per cent of capital stock. The reserve against circulation has been removed and the tax taken from deposits, and should be from circulation, for there is no more reason for taxing money than there is for taxing air and water, for money is the life-blood of trade and commerce.

In 1892 another turn of the screw was made and laws were passed making it impossible to issue and withdraw notes at will, with the result that when the pinch came in 1893 and a currency famine made excessive calls for notes it took months to supply the demand, and then the trouble was over and months more passed by before withdrawals could be made.

Is it surprising that a system so hampered and tied down should not in every case respond to the business wants of this great nation?

Is it not a greater wonder that it has survived at all? And it would not if it had not possessed elements of vitality and strength that made it indestructible.

In 1882 Comptroller John Jay Knox advised an increase of circulation to 95 per cent of the market value of the bonds he'd. and every Comptroller, Republican and Democratic, from that day to this has repeated the recommendation in a more or less modified form.

In my judgment, the wise course would be to permit an issue of notes to the market value of the bonds, for behind this is the first lien upon all of the assets of the bank, and the liability of the stockholder added, so that no possible loss could ever come to a bill holder if such a plan were adopted.

But this bill provides for an issue to par only, and its probable immediate effect would be to add about twenty millions of national-bank notes to the currency of the country.

Furthermore, by giving a possibility of a slight profit on circulation, it may stimulate the taking out of circulation by banks which now have none, and may encourage the organization of small banks in the West and South.

We have more banks in New England now than we need. As the law now stands the profit on note issues based on a 4 per cent bond of 1907 is less than one-third of 1 per cent, but that result is only obtained by having all money loaned all of the time and all at 6 per cent, which in actual experience is utterly impossible, and the probabilities are that very few banks can to-day show any profit on circulation.

The best proof of this is that in New York City alone there is a note issue of but seventeen millions against forty-nine millions of capital, and in the whole country there are four hundred and thirteen millions of unused privilege.

The special benefit to be derived from this change in the law seems to me to be the impetus it will give to the organization of small banks in the newer sections of the country.

The average capitalization as I found it a year or two ago under the national banking system was $178,000; under State laws, $88,000, and of private banks, $31,000.

Reduce the limit of possible capital to $25,000, give circulation to par of the bonds, withdraw all taxes from it, and I have no doubt but that large numbers of State and private banks will reorganize under the national system with results that would be exceedingly beneficial in many ways.

When I last examined this subject 66 per cent of our population resided in communities of less than 4,000 inhabitants.

By the last census there were 2,810 towns of from 1,000 to 4,000 people.

The national-bank system would give to them not only lower rates of interest but larger capital, and, what is of more importance, far greater security for deposits than most private banks can offer.

Protected by Government supervision and control, the capital of other States would flow in for investment where it would never be sent to be subject to State legislation or individual management.

Three years ago the report of the Comptroller showed that of the 525 banks in Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, one-third of the capital was contributed by Eastern stockholders. Of the 144 banks in Dakota, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, Washington, Wyoming, and Arizona, one-half was from the same source; and of the 410 banks in the South, one-sixth was from the North and East.

It is utterly impossible that this could be, except under the national system.

But not only would this bring in the capital of nonresidents, but it would develop a habit of depositing in banks the money which is now carried in the pocket and kept in the home in those sections where such facilities are not afforded, and every dollar so placed at once becomes an addition to the loanable funds of the community.

Such a system would soon become a splendid contribution to the business of the larger banks in the reserve cities and would furnish exchange between different points at far less cost than now.

Unite with these national banks in the small towns of the West and South the mutual savings-bank system of New England under the same management and without additional cost, as our laws permit, until the aggregate of deposits reaches half a million dollars, and the best feature of New England life will be transplanted to those sections of our country where now the use of pennies is unknown.

Such a community will soon become self-developing and self-reliant.

I refer with pardonable pride to the results of a system grown up from such beginnings in my own State.

The population of Connecticut is 746,258, and its savings-bank depositors number 375,810, with an average deposit of $435.01 each and the splendid total of $163,482,498.52. Match it in this Union if you can. This is where our 54,000 majority came from in 1896. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Last year 52,589 accounts were opened and 43,443 closed, and in ordinary years following up each closed account may be found a separate cottage built, a home furnished, or a child educated, and back of the open account—a guaranty against days of adversity or times of sorrow and a constant incentive to industry—economy and thrift, the virtues which are worth far more to a State or nation than mines of gold and silver or untold millions of legal-tender paper notes, which we sometimes call money.

It may be inferred from what I have said that I am in favor of the organization of small banks, and so I am, if nothing better can be had, but I would greatly prefer the branch-bank system.

It is a popular idea that, by the reduction of the minimum of capital to $25,000 in small towns, banking facilities will be provided in communities where there are not deposits or business enough to justify a larger capital.

Of course those are agricultural communities.

Instead of less than one-third of 1 per cent profit on circulation under the present law, assume, under the provisions of this bill, that in 6 per cent localities 1 per cent could be made.

It needs no argument to show that at any reasonable rate of interest on $25,000 it is impossible to maintain an independent organization, provide the management and equipment for a national bank, and return a reasonable profit to the investor.

It follows, therefore, that deposits must be added to a considerable amount or very heavy rates for discounts charged to even meet expenses, and where such rates of interest can be charged and are paid it is more profitable to loan capital direct than to invest it in low-interest bonds, bought at a high premium, on which to issue circulation.

Hence, in such communities the private banker has full sway and makes his own terms for loans, and will continue to have control until, by a system of branch banking, agencies for large and strong institutions are permitted to come into competition with him.

Deposits of at least double the amount of capital will be necessary to maintain an independent existence.

There is another fact which should be considered with reference to this feature of the bill.

The strength of a bank is its capital.

The deposit is a liability.

While deposits provide loanable funds, less the reserve required, the margin of safety to the depositor is in the precise proportion which capital bears to deposits.

A bank with $100,000 of deposits and $50,000 capital is twice as safe as one with the same deposits and $25,000 capital.

We are apt to look at the enormous deposits of some of our city banks and think how great and strong they are, but the prudent depositor will turn to the capital account and judge of the margin of safety to himself.

I would suggest to the gentleman in charge of this bill whether it might not be well to provide, at the organization of these small banks, for a compulsory increase of capital when a certain amount of deposits is reached.

Four years ago I came here a believer in the small independent bank, and I prefer it now to none at all; but the experience of every commercial nation except ours has demonstrated the wisdom and economy of the branch system.

It needs no argument to show that a large bank in a market town or commercial city and a hundred agencies established among country stores or with branch offices in small communities, and all connected by telephone or telegraph with the parent office, can do business far more economically, and hence serve these communities far more effectively, than a hundred independent organizations.

There is no more reason for objecting to it than there would be in passing a law forbidding a manufacturer establishing offices and salesrooms for his product in any number of cities in the country or anywhere else where he could find a market for his goods.

Any individual can go into any State and loan money, and if he can get credit he can borrow. Why should not five men associated together as a national banking association and under Government supervision and frequent inspection be allowed to do the same thing?

The claim here is that the country would be drained of money and the cities would be clogged; but the experience of other nations shows that by the branch-bank system the parent bank would receive money where it was not needed and interest rates were low and distribute it where it was wanted and interest rates were high, and, like the irrigating plants of the West, carry life and health and strength by a hundred little channels to what would otherwise be dry and thirsty ground.

As it is now, the country banks, with their city reserves and system of rediscounts, are practically branches of the banks in the reserve cities, but the business is done at greatly increased cost, and the country customer pays the bill.

Branches in other countries are the commercial drummers of their banking systems.

One of the conditions on which the charter of the Bank of France was recently renewed was that it should agree to establish a branch in each political division of the country.

Here we put our banks in a strait-jacket and wonder why money is so cheap in some places and dear in others.

I do not believe that the branch system would equalize rates in all parts of the country, for there are many important factors in that problem, but it would very materially help to improve present conditions.

Mr. Chairman, the subject of taxation is the important one, for it is upon the final decision of this question that the fate of the national system rests.

Contrary to the common thought upon the subject, I believe that the exercise of the power of note issue is a duty which a bank owes to the community rather than a privilege to the bank itself, and so believing, it seems to me to be absurd to tax it. A bank note is equivalent to the bank's check on its own redemption fund.

Taxes should be laid on property, and a bank note or a check is not property, but only a convenient instrument for the transfer of property.

As a war measure, a stamp tax on checks or anything else is justifiable.

On principle, there is no excuse for it.

One set of men organized a grocery firm, another a bank.

Each should pay a tax on their investment.

In the first case this is represented by the average stock on hand, plus average accounts due them, minus average accounts owing and notes outstanding.

The bank should also pay on its investment, which can only be represented by capital, surplus, and undivided profits.

But exactly here is the trouble with our national system.

The strongest competitor which the national bank has to-day is the trust company, organized under our State laws, with liberal privileges and all banking powers except that of note issue, and with practically unlimited power of maintaining branches anywhere in the world.

The taxes of the trust company are paid by the company.

It pays no national tax, and the stockholders pay no local tax on the shares which they own.

When the company is assessed locally under the national law, it can and does claim exemption from local taxation to the extent of its holdings in Government bonds.

With the national bank it is not so.

Its national tax is specifically on circulation.

Its local tax is on the shares of its stockholders, and as the bank, not the individual stockholders, owns the bonds held, no exemption can be claimed for the individual tax.

It makes no difference whether the stockholder pays his own tax or whether the bank pays it for all; the result is the same.

To anywhere nearly equalize the two, no tax whatever should be charged by the Government, but the actual cost of issuing the notes and maintaining the redemption bureau should be assessed pro rata upon the banks taking out circulation.

Even then the trust company and State banks would have a great advantage in local taxation.

The only remedy that I can see, and possibly the only salvation for the system, is to exempt the shares of national banks from all taxation, and to permit the investment in national banks to be taxed locally, as all other investments are, and paid by the banks themselves, with the same right as a trust company to plead exemption on Government bonds.

I am satisfied that the plan proposed here is much more just than the present 1 per cent tax on circulation, for under the present system the large city banks which do not take out circulation contribute nothing to the support of the Government, and have not since they succeeded in having the tax taken off from deposits.

If, instead of driving them out of the national system, it brings them to using their great influence toward securing a more equitable distribution of the burden between the city and country banks and the trust company, all will be well.

In closing, I beg the pardon of the House for having thus gone into the dry details of this measure.

I am a believer in a national banking system, not necessarily as it is now, but a system always under the watchful supervision and careful inspection of the National Government.

I am utterly opposed to the old State banks, with 45 different charter powers and 45 different kinds of note issues.

We are a great people, rich now beyond the dreams of our fathers and growing richer every day.

In many lines of industry we already lead the world.

Under the stimulus of protection other triumphs are awaiting us.

The sea is ours to conquer, if we will, and American genius will yet prove itself equal to the task.

But the dominant power of the globe will always be the one which controls the financial exchanges of the world.

Gentlemen, the victory will never come to us while our currency and banking system continues to be the sport of politics and the plaything of demagogues.

The one supreme purpose of this bill is to lay in standard gold a solid foundation upon which another Republican Congress may erect the splendid superstructure of a national-banking system, reorganized and improved, ready and fit to contest with the Bank of England for the financial supremacy of the world.

The bill is worthy of the affirmative vote of every lover of his country and every believer in her future greatness. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HERBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT FOR HOLIDAYS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That when the two Houses adjourn on Wednesday, December 20, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian, January 2, 1900.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a recess be taken to-morrow in order that we may join with the President and Senate in paying proper tribute to the memory of George Washington and that we take the vote on Tuesday instead of Monday. I ask unanimous consent that the order may be made to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the House adjourn over to-morrow for the purpose of paying tribute to the memory of George Washington and that the vote on this bill be postponed from Monday until Tuesday next.

Mr. DALZELL. At the same hour on Tuesday?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I want to inquire if that would interfere with the vote on Monday?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am willing that Monday shall be substituted for Saturday for the five-minute debate, and then the vote be taken immediately after the reading of the Journal on Tuesday.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Has it not been the experience of the gentleman from Tennessee through to-day that with the night sessions and the additional hour in the morning three days will be sufficient time for the remaining debate, without carrying the vote over for another day?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think so.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think it will be better to take the vote on Monday. I have no objection to the other part of the request.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Everybody who wishes can go to the celebration, and the debate can go on in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It will be in Committee of the Whole and no other business can be done.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the House, out of respect to the memory of the first President of the United States, ought to adjourn over.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think if Washington were alive to-day he would stay here in the House, if he was a member of it, and finish the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

UNVEILING THE STATUE OF DANIEL WEBSTER.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SULZER. I suppose this is read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That a committee consisting of three members from the Senate and five members from the House of Representatives be appointed to make arrangements for the reception and unveiling, on January 18, 1900, of the statue of Daniel Webster presented to the United States by Mr. Stilson Hutchins and erected on Massachusetts avenue, in the city of Washington.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as we have just refused to suspend our business out of respect for the memory of the most illustrious American, we ought not to be asked now to suspend our rules to honor a less illustrious one. To-morrow marks the 100th anniversary of the death of the first President of the United States—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas object?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will designate to act as Speaker this evening the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. GAMBLE.

The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the Speaker declared the House, in pursuance of its previous order, in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GAMBLE.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House for the session this evening the House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN, will please take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill H. R. No. 1—the financial bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the House of Representatives is now engaged in the discussion of one of the most important subjects of legislation that has occupied its attention in the later history of our country. Important it is, for the powers are here to fasten the gold standard upon our people. The design is clearly expressed in this bill to retire from circulation the greenbacks, "the people's money," and to clothe the national banks with the power to issue paper money in lieu of the Government greenbacks, and to make all United States bonds and obligations of the Government redeemable in gold instead of in "coin."

This plan is but the beginning of that policy the successive step in which will be the destruction of silver as money, save as subsidiary coin.

The Reed rules, ever elastic, always powerful, fashions the mode of procedure by which this infamy is perpetrated upon the country. The Rules Committee, the imperial progeny of the rules themselves, the representative of the greatest autocratic power that ever fastened itself upon a republic, is the agency through which the work is accomplished.

Without committee consideration, indeed without committees being appointed to consider, this measure is presented, important and far-reaching to all our people, and a rule is fixed for debate in this body which accords to each member of the minority here less than five minutes, on the average, for discussion, though this bill comprehends within its scope a change of the entire banking and financial concerns of the country.

In the usual and orderly procedure questions of such vitality and importance have taken weeks for deliberation, have gone to committee composed of members of both political parties, been there considered, and received in this House on reports of such committee.

But now all safeguards are set aside by the rules and by the Rules Committee to speedily pass this measure at the behest of the special interests.

Upon the first day of our assembling here this Congress, with one-third of the membership of the House not members of the former Congress, you saw fastened upon you, with no opportunity for debate and amendment, and before the committees were appointed, this code of rules which bind you down like slaves so long as they are continued.

You heard stated here by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZIEL] that a reason for their adoption thus was that they had been the rules of the former Congress; but he did not then state, what you yourself do know, Mr. Chairman, and what every member of that Congress knows, that they were passed the first day of the Fifty-fifth Congress, without committee consideration, under the operation of the previous question, without the opportunity for a half minute's debate, and with no opportunity for amendments. The reason stated by the gentleman, when the facts are known, becomes a most cogent one, does it not, new members of the House, for you to thus shackle yourselves, as you of the majority did, in supporting them by your vote on that day?

The time I have will not permit a discussion of the great questions of money and finance, but I shall content myself in the few moments I have with offering some observations which, under the operation of the previous question, I was denied making on the day the whilom Rules Committee refused to have a discussion of the rules, and which can be so appropriately made at this time, as every power of the rules has been invoked here to force this measure upon the House and upon the country.

The disfranchisement of constituencies under the mode of legislation enforced by the Reed rules, which for years have czarized this body, is not a new subject of complaint either on this or on the Republican side of the House.

Our fathers established for us a republican form of government, and with it transmitted to us the House of Representatives, republican in form it has remained, but how changed in fact.

For years the most popular branch of the American Congress has been governed with a rod of iron, under the sanction of iron rules. These rules were enforced by a Speaker of the House once, and his name will go thundering down through all ages as a ruler of great sapience, a man of iron nerve, iron will, while his colleagues on this floor were buried, as were the rights and appeals of their constituencies, in a grave of oblivion, unheard of and unknown, save as they are recorded in the roll calls of the House, for they were vouchsafed the right to vote. This was not a survival of the fittest, but a triumph of the powerful.

History records that we have a republican form of government, but the evidence of it is not found in the House of Representatives. Scourged in conscience and in action, with party fealty making cowards of you all, you members of the majority, who were members then, and your constituencies were disfranchised, while this body existed only as a relic of a proud and historic form of people's government, intended by our fathers to have been transmitted to their posterity.

Read the proof in the earlier and later history of our country, in the earlier and later records of the House; read it, gentlemen, honor bright, read it in your own hearts and minds and in your consciences, you who had the power in this Congress to change those rules if you had had the courage.

Under these rules and practices in the last Congress more time was given for the discussion of the smallest appropriation than could be had to discuss the great questions of currency and finance; more time given to discuss whether a member used or intended to use the word "many" or "most" in debate than was given to discuss the great questions of international law; more time given in opposition to the President's civil-service laws than was accorded for the discussion of the great questions of national taxation.

The Committee on Rules, with its great choking coils like huge anacondas intertangling and stifling legislation, disfranchising free men and Americans, is a fitting background for a picture of the throne.

The Rules Committee is all powerful; such rules as these are drastic; but withal, they seem to be flexible enough in their enforcement to well serve party ends and private purposes. Not only are such rules subject to great criticism and complaint, but the peculiar and eccentric enforcement of them is still more subject to criticism and complaint. Such a power of facility and expedience is found within them that they can be and have been used to thwart not only the will of the American people, but the Senate of the United States expressing that will.

Under those rules, in the second session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, when the people of the country and their Representatives in Congress wanted to pass a measure for Cuba, the magic powers of the rules were invoked to suppress and dishearten; when the Senators of all political parties—Republican, Populist, and Democratic—passed a joint resolution for Cuba, it came to the most numerous branch of the American Congress, and there, under the mysterious influence of the Reed rules, it went to sleep in the catacombs of the House. On the other hand, when it was desired by the power that was to pass a measure, it was rushed through the House by a meteor process, without discussion and debate, as was shown by the monetary-commission bill, passed in the dying hour of the special session of the preceding Congress.

Under these rules the objection of a single member last session of Congress prevented the passage of a law to stop the importation of Chinese and coolie laborers, under contract, into the Hawaiian Islands, and thousands have in the meantime been brought, practically as slaves, to those islands of recent acquisition.

If this is not proof of monarchy, show me the one-man power more potent than this.

I need not say that a single man, a single power and influence, dominated this House. It is true that one man under these rules can govern and control it; all others are subjected to his sweet will, and this denial to the people of full representation makes their Representatives in Congress, to serve their constituencies in any degree, act not as self-respecting and independent men, but as cringing sycophants to the one-man power.

This situation, so depressing to independent manhood, so dangerous to the Republic, is known throughout the land, is a subject of daily comment in the press, in the coordinate branch of Congress, and in this House, and yet those who complain and have the power hesitate to correct this dangerous evil that threatens our existence. They raise their hands, but have not the courage to strike the blow.

The party in power, as individuals, admit these evils, confess this abuse of the individual rights of members; yet as a House they are pleased or forced to let their party spirit and partisanship overcome their judgment and continue these wrongs that tend to sap the foundation of our Government.

Do you ask why we should have the right to discuss and amend? The answer is found in one of the blackest pieces of legislation that ever blotted American legislative history, passed because it was unknown, not discussed. I refer to the demonetization act. One of the evils of all deliberative bodies is the danger of the passage of measures without a full understanding. If the leading statesmen Senators could be deceived in that body, where they have full and free debate, how much more are we entitled to the right of full and free discussion in this body, so clearly and so closely representative of the people. Were not Congress and the people deceived by a failure to discuss?

Let me give you the burning evidence of statesmen witnesses, living and dead. I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Referring to the act demonetizing silver in 1873, they spoke in Congress as follows:

Judge Kelley, of Pennsylvania (see RECORD, volume 7, part 2, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 1605):

I was ignorant of the fact that it would demonetize the silver dollar. * * *

Mr. Blaine (see RECORD of February 15, 1878, page 1063):

I did not know anything that was in the bill at all.

Mr. Voorhees (see RECORD of February 15, 1878, page 1063):

I frankly say that I did not.

Also, Mr. Voorhees (see RECORD of January 15, 1878, page 332):

Its enactment * * * unknown to the people and to four-fifths of Congress.

Senator Beck, of Kentucky (see RECORD of January 10, 1878, page 258):

Illegal and unconstitutional consummation of a fraud.

Also, Senator Beck, of Kentucky (see RECORD, volume 7, part 1, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 260):

It was never understood by either House of Congress.

Mr. Burchard, of Illinois (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 13, 1876, volume 4, part 5, page 4560):

Unaccompanied by written report, * * * unknown to members of Congress, who without opposition allowed it to pass.

Judge Holman (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 4, part 6, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, Appendix, page 193):

Its passage * * * was a colossal swindle.

Mr. Bright, of Tennessee (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 7, part 1, second session Forty-fifth Congress, page 584):

It passed by fraud in the House; * * * passed without discussion, debate being cut off by operation of the previous question. It was passed to my certain information under such circumstances that the fraud escaped the attention of some of the most watchful as well as the ablest statesmen in Congress at the time.

Senator ALLISON of Iowa (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 7, part 2, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 1058):

The bill was doctored. * * *

Senator Hereford, of West Virginia (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 14, 1877, page 205):

One of the most remarkable and to my mind one of the most fraudulent pieces of legislation this or any other country ever saw.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 4, part 6, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, Appendix, page 197):

It was not discussed, as shown by the record, and neither members of Congress nor the people understood the scope of the legislation.

Why allow discussion and amendment? Look at the appalling results of a failure to discuss.

If measures of such widespread import and great disaster can be enacted without knowledge, because not discussed and debated, how many evils, great and small, can be ingrafted on our legislation when protected by the rule of no discussion?

Time will not permit me to discuss the desired remedies and the changes in the rules necessary to secure the rights of members; these are known to those who have come beneath their crushing power.

An abrogation of the Rules Committee would place all public matters of legislation regularly introduced and pending before the House on equal terms.

Annulment of rules in derogation of liberty of debate and amendment measurably would secure to each constituency represented on this floor rights that heretofore have been denied and in a marked degree to new members of the House.

The effect of the Reed rules is known, and if they are continued a time may come when a Brutus, a Cromwell, some bad man, may use this power to subvert the Republic. Mr. Chairman, I register my protest and my voice against such a dangerous system. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, if any impetus were needed to push the money question into the front of national issues, no greater could be wanted than the passage of the bill now before the House. While its advocates indulge in the vain hope of taking this great question out of the arena of politics and public discussion, they are really adding fuel to the flame of this burning issue and adding strength to the Democratic position and making it impregnable at the coming national election. A discussion of this bill is calculated to arouse the people once more to the realization of the dangerous tendency of gold monometallism and all its attendant evils in a degree that will not only surprise our adversaries, but which must sweep the Republican party from power, or else eventuate in the complete overthrow of our present economic system.

If I were asked to define the scope and effect of this bill, should it be enacted into law, I would say that it was to contract the volume of our primary money, to perpetuate industrial combinations and monopoly, build up and maintain plutocracy, firmly establish imperialism upon the nation, and place the masses at the mercy of the classes. That such is the intention of all its advocates I can not believe, yet that such is its effect I can not doubt. That it will pass this House is a foregone conclusion, and all its opponents can hope to do is to call the attention of the country to its sweeping provisions and its blighting and disastrous results, so that the responsibility of its enactment may be placed where it belongs.

First of all, it involves a complete abandonment of bimetalism and aims to fix indefinitely the gold standard upon this country, thus proclaiming to all the nations of the world that no further effort is to be made by the United States toward international agreement on the question of bimetalism. It is a complete surrender by this nation of its independence in her fiscal affairs to the European or English financial policy. Moreover, it is a complete reversal of the policy of the national Republican party, which declared for bimetalism by international agreement and which now ignores its platform professions and yields to the demands of the gold monometallists.

It is a complete vindication of the leaders of the national Democratic party when they predicted the fallacy of the Republican position and insisted upon independent bimetalism, and will present in the future the clean-cut proposition whether the American people favor the single gold standard or the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 by this nation alone, as laid down in the Chicago platform.

But the bill does not stop at fixing the gold standard. It further provides that all interest-bearing obligations of the Government (United States bonds) and all United States notes (greenbacks) and Treasury notes (Sherman Act silver notes) shall be redeemed in gold, and that all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be payable in gold.

The Secretary of the Treasury must maintain the gold-reserve fund for the redemption of all United States notes and Treasury notes, and he may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States. The United States notes and Treasury notes can not be withdrawn except for gold. No silver bullion can be coined except in subsidiary coin, and the Treasury notes upon said bullion shall be canceled and not reissued. In the event the reserve fund is insufficient for redemption purposes, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue and sell 3 per cent twenty-year bonds to replenish the reserve fund. The national banks are permitted to issue bank notes to the full amount of their bond deposit without further security, and the tax on national banks is reduced to one-tenth of 1 per cent.

That the effect of this measure is to produce contraction is too evident to be denied by its friends and advocates. In the first place, it absolutely suspends the coinage of another legal-tender silver dollar and confines silver coinage to that of subsidiary coin, which is only legal tender to the limited amount of $10, and thus further depreciates the mint value of all silver bullion. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury practically to redeem even the silver dollars, if he deems it necessary, so that silver is virtually taken out of circulation as primary money and is degraded to a mere token money for change, like the nickel and the penny, and can henceforth have but little effect on the prices of commodities. Everything is based on gold and gold alone as a standard of value, and all other forms of money are virtually redeemable in gold, and the prices of all commodities are measured in gold. Not only so, but all obligations, both public and private, are payable henceforth in gold. In fact, when eventually the purposes of this bill are attained, all the Treasury notes, United States notes (greenbacks), and silver certificates and silver dollars will go out of circulation and there will be no other full legal-tender money for the payment of public and private contracts except gold. Can the purpose and tendency of this measure be anything else but to counteract the increasing influx in the world's production of gold and to check and contract its volume?

Not only is this the purpose, but it is evidently the further purpose of the contractionists to reduce the volume of full legal-tender silver money and thus to contract the general volume of full legal-tender money. Such a course is bound to result in an undue contraction of the circulating medium and enhance the price of money on one side and decrease the price of commodities, except such as are protected by a trust, combination, or monopoly on the other side. While population increases and commerce should expand on one side, the volume of primary money contracts on the other, and the inevitable result must be falling prices of wages and all commodities not in a trust and enhancing in value of the standard dollar; in one word, dear money and hard times.

It has been the recent boast of our Republican friends that by the great influx of gold, prices have gone up and money has gone down. We do not deny it. But now we are led to believe that our friends are apprehensive that there may be too much money and it must be made scarcer to enhance its value. It looks like the holders of the obligations of our people, both private and public, are afraid that unless there is a contraction of the volume of money that they will not receive enough. It looks like the creditor is afraid that the debtor will not pay him enough, and his cries seem to have been heeded by the Republican party and this measure is proposed to give him relief—surely will give him relief—even if it must be done at the great sacrifice of the debtor. Let us see how our ledger stands:

Gold coin, including bullion in Treasury.....	$963,498,384
Standard silver dollars, including bullion in Treasury.....	563,697,082
Subsidiary silver.....	74,896,552

--------------------------------------	-------------

The total outstanding principal of the public debt, as per statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, is $1,991,927,906.92. In this sum is included the following items, classified as part of the public debt:

Amount outstanding:
Treasury notes of 1890.....	$33,518,280
Silver certificates.....	406,085,504
Legal-tender notes.....	346,681,016
Total.....	846,284,800
Total interest-bearing debt.....	1,046,048,750

It must be observed, at a glance at these figures, that the effect of this measure will be to place the entire stock of our different classes of money, to wit, the sum of $1,781,852,124, upon the amount of gold coin in the Treasury, to wit, the sum of $963,498,384, and that it virtually demonetizes the $563,697,082—silver dollars and bullion—in the Treasury. Not only so, but it further contracts the volume of our primary money by providing for the redemption and practical retirement of the $346,681,016 of United States notes, commonly called greenbacks. But it does not stop there, but further strains the gold standard by making the total interest-bearing bonded debt, to wit, the sum of $1,046,048,750, and now payable in either gold or silver, payable in gold alone.

Now, it may be said by our adversaries that this bill does not contain any provision for the redemption of the silver dollar or the silver certificate in gold coin, but we reply that such must be the ultimate effect of this measure, for in section 4 it is provided:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to use said reserve fund in maintaining at all times the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government; and if at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary, in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, he may at his discretion exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States.

What is this but a discretionary power in the Secretary of the Treasury to practically retire every silver dollar and every silver certificate and every greenback or Treasury note, even down to the subsidiary silver? The word "exchange" as here employed is synonymous to "redeem," "retire," or "withdraw;" for no one doubts that if by some legerdemain the silver dollar, the silver certificate, the Treasury note, or the greenback should fall in value as measured by gold, that a hostile Secretary of the Treasury could and would "exchange" them by paying out gold for them, and then placing them on the retired list until they could, by a little further stretch of authority, be placed in the smelting pot or macerator, and then sell them at public or private sale as curios. Whenever a greenback or other Government paper money or silver dollar is redeemed or exchanged it goes into the maw, never to see daylight again; for nothing can get it out but an equivalent in gold.

But to go back to the relation between debtor and creditor as affected by this bill: There is besides the public debt a large private debt which may now be paid in money resting on the bimetallic standard, which will further enhance the price of the gold dollar after this bill becomes a law, and which will add to the burden of the debtor, the taxpayer, and producer outside of the trust. It is estimated that this debt, consisting of bonded debt of railroads and industrial combinations, State, municipal, and other corporate bonded debt, and mortgage indebtedness, ranges anywhere from fifteen to twenty billions in this country.

Again, the interest on this indebtedness amounts to nearly a billion dollars a year. Besides there remain the taxes and other fixed charges to be paid by the people in an enhancing gold standard amounting to something like a half million annually. In contemplating these figures the people can realize somewhat the gain of the creditor and the loss of the debtor, for it can not be denied that the people—that is, the small producers and the wage-earners—must ultimately pay these debts in labor or products and that it is not the larger operator or monopoly which pays them. These, it is true, pay them, but they pay them with the higher monopoly charges wrung from the people.

The railroads owing this debt, and all other corporations, will pay them with additional charges paid by the people, and after all the toiling masses must respond to the grinding exactions of the classes. Were these debts, public and private, paid in the money in which they were contracted, under the bimetallic standard, they would amount to no more than their face value, but under the enhancing value of the single gold standard they will require almost double the amount of products or labor to pay them, for when commodities and wages are pressed down by falling prices or limited production it requires an equivalent of greater effort or amount of commodities to pay existing and continuing indebtedness or to perform a required task of labor.

Thus we are brought face to face with the great economic question involved in this measure, to wit, the contraction of the volume of primary money and the corresponding fall of prices of commodities.

When money is plentiful and keeps pace with the demands of commerce, enterprise flourishes and is buoyant, prices tend upward, and enterprise is active and courageous in exploiting old and new activities, thus stimulating the division of labor in various directions and paying higher wages to the individual laborer. Thus the power to purchase and consume is augmented and production increased. The result is prosperity and the uplifting of the toiling masses. When money is scarce and insufficient for the demands of commerce, enterprise languishes, prices tend downward, wages decrease, labor is only partially employed, and laborers and consumers lack the means to purchase commodities. The result is hard times: the aggregation of large capital to control production ensues; trusts, combinations, and monopoly take the place of diversified labor; and the formation of the classes and the masses takes place, and industrial life is thrown out of its equipoise.

This was the condition of affairs a year ago and even some time before, when, chiefly owing to the low price of commodities, individual enterprise sought shelter under the trust or combination; in the meantime prices were stimulated by inflowing gold, partly attracted by low prices and partly augmented by larger production of gold. Short crops abroad in the staple products, too, had their effect in drawing gold to this country, and both low prices here and a want of agricultural products abroad, together with the stimulating effect of more primary money, although slight in its effect, stimulated our exports and brought into circulation among our people more money and has placed us in possession of a temporary partial prosperity.

But at what sacrifice did it come and how long will it last? In the first place, it is partial only, because prices have now been driven up chiefly by means of combination and monopoly, and the good prices our farmers are receiving for their products and our laborers for their labor are wasted again in buying their commodities at extravagant trust prices. That the present so-called prosperity is short lived can not be doubted, for as soon as the present natural stimulus subsides, the present fit of good times, of which our Republican friends delight to speak, will be at an end. Large wheat and cotton crops at home and abroad will bring lower prices to the farmer, and lockouts in the factories and other industries under the trust, under the scheme of limited production, will affect the laborer in his wages, and to add to all these causes a contracting volume of money inaugurated in this measure will do the balance, and hard times will once more be upon us, only with the aggravating evil of the trusts added to our ills.

Then it will be when this measure will produce its most blighting effects. The industrial combinations called trusts will then exercise full sway and by reason of the scarcity of money and falling prices and the extinction of competition reap their full crop of exactions and repressions. Individual enterprise will languish and be crowded from our industrial system and the owner of a small business or smaller factory will seek shelter under the trust, or, being entirely dependent, seek employment as a wage-earner of the trust and place himself at its mercy, or drop into the vast army of the unemployed or partially employed. Equal opportunity to the individual to earn according to his capacity will be a thing of the past, fair competition will be gone, and unfair competition will only lead to greater and speedier combination. Democracy will be on the wane and plutocracy will raise its hideous head and clamor for imperialism to protect and defend it.

But, say our friends, we have authorized the national banks to issue their notes to the full amount of our national bonded debt, and instead of having the present $241,350,871 of national-bank notes we will have at least a billion of national-bank notes in circulation to do the business of the country; when money is scarce the national banks will increase their issue and when it is too plentiful the banks will contract. But we reply in the first place the principle of the national banks is wrong, because it encourages the increase and perpetuation of the national bonded debt; that the national-bank notes are after all backed by the credit of the nation and would not have the quality of money without; that they are only a limited legal tender and finally dependent upon their metallic money basis; that they receive a bonus from the Government which the Government could dispense with and issue the notes itself, etc.; but that after these objections and many more have been urged the fact remains that it is not true that the national banks will expand their issue when money is scarce and contract when it tends to plethora.

The very reverse is true, namely, that they will expand the issue during expansion and contract during contraction. This was never more true than during the great panic of 1893, when the national banks refused not only to expand, but drew in their deposits and thus increased the panic. The truth is that it is their interest to contract during panics to save their depositors as well as their assets. This is a rule that national banks as well as private banks observe, and the only relief at last can come from the Government, as but recently demonstrated, when the Secretary of the Treasury resorted to the purchase of United States bonds in advance of their maturity to relieve the money stress in New York money circles.

What this measure will accomplish is to create the greatest paper-money trust under the sun, one which will insist upon the constant augmentation of the national debt instead of its reduction, because its very life is dependent upon such a course. It will further conduce to substitute it for all the private banks and extend its ramifications to every hamlet and village, and will in time absolutely dictate the fiscal policy of the Government. What that policy may be is foreshadowed in the fact that the present bill sprang from the brains of a coterie of national bankers who have faithfully followed a foreign fiscal policy and who are opposed to anything that savors of an independent American policy.

But it may be said that the very fact of establishing a large gold reserve fund will give such confidence that there will be no necessity to redeem any other class of money, and all will circulate and remain in circulation at a perfect parity. This, too, is contradicted by past experience. If the redemption of the greenbacks had not been stayed, they would long have been out of existence. As long as the Government discriminates itself between the different classes of its money, and holds out an inducement to issue more interest-bearing gold bonds, whenever a run is made upon it, so long will money changers continue to present themselves with money which can either be redeemed or exchanged for gold and demand the gold until the last dollar other than gold is out of circulation.

Such is the inevitable logic of the situation. So that to whatever side we turn we are met with contraction and the specter of a rising gold standard and a proportionate falling of prices of all farm products, raw material, and wages, and a consequent rise of trust articles. Is it not worse than folly, amounting to hollow mockery, for our Republican friends to declare against trusts and in the next breath urge the passage of this bill, which is the mother of all trusts?

True it is that other forces go toward building up and maintaining the trusts, such as unfair and unrestricted competition, especially in transportation and in other industrial activities, and also unequal taxation, and, indeed, even remote cosmic forces; but giving equal opportunity to all and special privileges to none presupposes the existence of an equitable monetary system which produces neither undue contraction nor undue inflation; but a monetary scheme which fosters absolute contraction can only eventuate in an undue distribution of wealth, with a constant and growing tendency toward enriching the few and impoverishing the many, and is therefore the very base and life of combination, trust, and monopoly.

On the other hand, rising prices form the strongest antidote to trusts and combinations. In such an atmosphere the trusts can not thrive well, because all enterprise, however small, is stimulated to growth and advancement and equipped for the arena of a fair competition. On a falling market, however, enterprise is paralyzed and must hide itself under the cloak of combination and restricted production, thus deadening fair competition. The trusts are, moreover, the advocates of expansion and imperialism. Their interests lie in the direction of commercialism and the exploitation of distant and dependent colonies.

Not satisfied with a depressed home market and the regular reciprocal relations that foreign trade affords, they clamor for the enforced traffic with colonial dependencies, and, apprehensive of the growing unrest among the people and their employees, they cry for a large standing army, the keystone in the arch of imperialism. Devoid of patriotism, they become the enemies of free institutions, with no other motive than greed and worldly power. No wonder that they are anxious to turn to world policies in order to divert the attention of the people from their ills at home; it is their supreme interest to do so. It is thus that we find the friends of this measure closely allied to the schemes of territorial expansion and imperialism. Both are the offspring of foreign policies and utterly un-American in their tendencies.

If there is one fact more prominent than all others it is that while this Administration has increased taxation and the bonded indebtedness of this nation it is now about to reduce the volume of money with which to pay these burdens; to place its function of issuing paper money in the hands of a gigantic bank trust protected by the credit of the Government; to turn all industrial production and private enterprise into the clutches of monopoly. To do the bidding of monopoly it proposes to substitute imperialism for democracy and to reduce the great masses of the people to poverty and make them dependent upon the crumbs that may fall from the table of monopoly. In the name of the common people, in the name of democracy, I protest! Gentlemen of the majority, you may pass this bill, but the American people are apt to reverse your judgment in 1900 by the election of W. J. Bryan and a Congress which will stand by the Chicago platform. You are sowing the wind, you will reap the whirlwind. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The passage of this bill will not settle the great money question. Before it can be settled it must be settled right, and it will not be settled right until bimetalism is restored, and bimetalism can only be restored by the independent action of this nation as declared by the Chicago platform. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I feel some little embarrassment in attempting to discuss the matter before the House, but I think I see the way, and the thoughtful way, too, by which my course can be justified. I voted for the Teller resolution in this House, and was the only Republican in the House that did so. Now, I expect to vote for this bill, and I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is a matter of duty to vote for it. I have reasoned myself to the conclusion that I will best serve my country by voting for this proposition, laying aside entirely the question of my loyalty to the Republican party. [Applause.]

Sir, this financial question has been discussed for twenty long years. The sprightly, eloquent gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] complained of the "gag law." Why, the discussion began in 1873, and there has been a constant, unrestricted, unrestrained, unobstructed flow of argument in the shape of periodicals and eloquence extending from the far and woolly West to the Atlantic Ocean, as steady in its course as the roar of the mighty Columbia River over the Cascades or of the Niagara over the cataracts. [Laughter and applause.] Yet the gentleman complains that he has been "gagged." [Laughter.] Why, the whole thing has become hoary with age. It is the grandfather question now in these United States. [Renewed laughter.]

It is said that man changes his entire being every seven years—the nails, and every particle, every tooth in him, and every hair upon his head is turned to something else. Seven into twenty-six goes three and nearly four times. Over three generations, taking the measure of that length of time, have been spending their energies and the best part of their life in discussing this great question. Every child has become familiar with some of the expressions, some of the favored ones, some of those that glittered, the diamonds of thought that came along from the free and unlimited coinage of silver orators throughout the country, so that "16 to 1" has been known for more than twenty years by every child from 1 to 20 years.

I heard some little girls myself in the town of Taylorsville not long ago. There were five in the group and one little boy. One said, "I do not know another little boy in all this end of the town, and I don't know why it is." Another said, "Why, on our side of town there are 16 to 1—16 girls to 1 boy." [Laughter.] So that the truth is that no question has ever attracted the attention of the people of the United States for so long a period; no question has had as many teachers and as many influences employed on the mind, taking both sides of it, in trying to enlighten the people, in trying to analyze the question, in trying to get at the ideal system of finance that will bring to this country and its people the greatest possible blessing as this question, in which we have the free coinage of silver on the one side and the gold standard on the other.

Mr. Chairman, we ought to have the ideal system. The American people are entitled to the best in everything, because the American man is the best man. Why happens it so? The commingling of the blood of the best tribes of humanity throughout this entire universe has produced an entirely new type of manhood. In settling this new country of ours and in overcoming all the obstructions to civilization and solving them it required the most hardy representatives of the varied tribes of humanity in the world. They came from every tribe, from every nation, and almost from every tongue. From every phase of humanity the most hardy, courageous representatives of these various tribes came. They came here to this glorious land under the inspiring influence of our system, that has been properly called "the world's best hope." They put forth their best possible effort within the range of human possibility.

The commingling of the blood of the various representatives of the various tribes of the world produced this distinct species of man, the American type. It is the greatest and grandest, as it has recently shown itself, in arms, for there is no people in the world who can fight us. I do not want to brag too much of our folks, but it begins to look as if no nation of the world can now stand before the courage of this matchless American soldier, American energy, and American brains.

Then, I say, we are entitled to the best system of finance—the ideal system—if we can get it. Let us see whether we have it or not. I understand the selecting of everything that is best, whether in human character or in a system, and excluding every infirmity so as to form a type or model, is what we call the "ideal."

Now, what is the true test as to whether you have attained to an ideal system in anything, to the ideal touching human character, to the ideal touching any system? The true test is this—if I understand it—the extent of its success. Let me illustrate: Suppose "A" were to contend that he had discovered a theory by which the speed of the horse could be increased, and he argues the excellence of that theory. It might be that no human being would be able to meet his arguments in its support, but did not agree with him. But suppose that in this conflict of opinion, this war of thought touching that simple question of the increase in the speed of the horse, that some one says, Well, let us try it. Why theorize any further on it? And they put the horse upon the track and they apply to him the spurs to quicken his diligence in the race; and here is the test. If he surpasses all other horses in the race, makes better time than has before been made, there is no further room for argument, you have settled it all by actual experience.

So, Mr. Chairman, with this question. In order to determine whether we have an ideal system now and whether this bill will improve it, whether this is to be the finishing touch that makes it the best we ever had, we must try the experiment. An experiment is a trial deliberately instituted. A practical test, proof. John Adams, in speaking of political experiments, said: "Political experiment can not be made in a laboratory nor determined in a few hours. A political experiment can only be made by applying the proposed theory to the test, practical experiment." Now, then, a few years ago it was alleged that this idea of a single standard would not do. I thought so. A distinguished gentleman who sits beside me—a Democrat—also thought so, except he was a little wilder on the subject than I was, and he went for the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and I wanted the limited coinage—the American product. Hundreds and thousands of the best men in this Republic thought that the double standard was the only way by which you could approach a perfect system of finance.

I followed the ordinary processes of reasoning: maybe they were simple, but still I followed them. My idea was that in order to afford the citizens the greatest possible opportunities in life there should be the largest possible amount of money in circulation that could be kept good. My notion touching it was that two agencies constituting basic money could come nearer meeting the demand of business than one, just as I thought that two men could bear a burden of 100 pounds better than one; just as I thought that two baskets of fish could meet the demand of hungry appetites of a multitude of a thousand better than one basket, if one basket was catfish; and arguing along that line of thought, I reached the conclusion that the money or redemption money of the country, that which we denominate the standard, should be a double standard and not a single. That is the conclusion to which I had come. I acted upon it.

When we come to put it to the actual test of practical experiment, it is a fact that has been established that the single standard is best. Let me see if I can not prove it.

I find, Mr. Chairman, the best definition of the ideal system of money is embraced in the message of the President of the United States, and I invite the attention of the House to it. He says: "Increased activity in industry, with its welcome attendance—a larger employment for labor at higher wages—gives to the body of the people a larger power to absorb the circulating medium."

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LINNEY. Yes.

Mr. COX. I want to predicate my question on this extract, which I will read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Fifty-fifth Congress:

As a creditor, no holder of any bond has any right to demand one cent more than the contract entitles him to, to wit, payment in coin. To pay less than the debt is repudiation. To force the taxpayer to pay more is an extortion. Coin is defined to be a piece of metal on which certain characters are stamped, making it legally current as money. Therefore gold and silver, at the discretion of the debtor, is the money in which, under the contract, the bonds may be legally and morally paid.

Has the gentleman shed his toe nails since he made that speech? [Laughter.]

Mr. LINNEY. That is by no means a question of importance in connection with the pending question. My friend will have no difficulty in settling that question for himself. It has no connection with the argument that I am making.

It is further true that year by year, as the President says—

Increased activity in industry, with its welcome attendant—a larger employment for labor at higher wages—gives to the body of the people a larger power to absorb the circulating medium. It is further true that year by year, with larger areas of land under cultivation, the increasing volume of agricultural products, cotton, corn, and wheat, calls for a larger volume of money supply. This is especially noticeable at the crop-harvesting and crop-moving period.

In its earlier history the national banking act seemed to prove a reasonable avenue through which needful additions to the circulation could from time to time be made. Changing conditions have apparently rendered it now inoperative to that end. The high margin in bond securities required, resulting from large premiums which Government bonds command in the market, or the tax on note issues, or both operating together, appear to be the influences which impair its public utility.

The attention of Congress is respectfully invited to this important matter with the view of ascertaining whether or not such reasonable modifications can be made in the national banking act as will render its service in the particulars here referred to more responsive to the people's needs. I again urge that national banks be authorized to organize with a capital of $25,000.

Now, sir, the question to which I call the attention of the House, and which I believe to be the important question in this connection, is this: Is not the suggestion of the President of the United States touching the finances of the country the ideal in finance? No reflecting mind in this body can escape that conclusion.

There has been an increase in the population of this country during the last five years of at least 6,270,000 people. There has been an increase in the revenues of the country—the circulating medium—during the same period of $302,103,408, unless the figures which have been presented to me are erroneous. They are taken from and founded upon the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The increase during the last five years of money in circulation has kept pace with the enormous increase in population and business of the country.

Who would have dreamed during the last ten years that the existing gold standard could have the effect of thus increasing the circulating medium? Even the wildest greenback inflationist could not have claimed more for his pet financial system than has already been attained by the existing gold standard.

Now, sir, the question to which I desire to call the attention of the House is simply this, and let us see whether I am correct or not in the assertion that the ideal system embodied in the declaration of the President in the message I have just referred to has been approved by the thoughtful men of this age and commends itself to the thoughtful people of the country. Now to the proof. We can easily recur to the period and to the financial conditions existing in 1860. We had at that time in operation State banks in almost all of the States of the Union, and you all know the effect of their operations. The circulating medium of the country aggregated a per capita of about $13.85. I have examined the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, made at that time, and believe that this statement, touching the amount of the circulating medium, is correct. On the basis of that examination I assert, and I believe I am correct in the assertion, that the aggregate per capita circulation of the country was only $13.85; in 1861, only $13.98; in 1862, $10.23; in 1863, $17.84; in 1864, $19.67; on down, in 1873, $18.10. Get down within five years of the present period and the amount is $22.93; four years ago, $21.10; three years ago, $22.49; two years ago, $22.66. This year, with $1,904,071,881 of circulating medium and with 76,148,000 people, the highest ever reached in the history of this Republic from the time of the organization of the first State in it, the unprecedented per capita circulation of $25 was reached, and that, too, under the gold standard. In the face of these facts, toe nails or no toe nails, any gentleman who has intelligence enough to cross the Mississippi River, or Coon Creek, so far as that is concerned, ought to be willing, it seems to me, to yield his preconceived views touching the matter and as a man accept the truth. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Gird up your loins, gentlemen; face these facts. Take this ideal standard, which no one can possibly deny. Follow the record, and you are as certainly led to the conclusion that I reach as that you have an existence. Figures do not lie. I know lawyers can make a great deal of harm out of figures sometimes, but in the hands of honorable gentlemen upon this floor, who will always be caught if they get wrong, they point us with absolute certainty to the truth. Twice two make four. That is absolutely certain. Whether A died is a moral question, depending upon the evidence. I rely upon this kind of conclusion, which is absolute to a mathematical certainty, founded upon figures that no man controverts. Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman answer just one question?

Mr. LINNEY. Why, certainly, my friend, with pleasure.

Mr. SIMS. In the extract that was read from your speech of less than two years ago, in which you said that to force debtors to pay a better money or higher-priced money than that named in the contract was extortion—how do you avoid such effect if this bill passes?

Mr. LINNEY. I am glad my friend called my attention to that. I was just coming to that anyway; but give me time and I will answer it. Being the only Republican upon this side that voted for the Teller resolution, I ought to be able to give a reason for it, which I will do. I believed then and I believe now that there are two crimes in this country touching finance. Repudiation is a crime. That means the failure or refusal of the debtor class to pay the last cent that is due. Extortion is likewise a crime, recognized in inspiration, recognized in the law books when it assumes a certain character touching official relations. I believe now, as I believed then, that extortion is a greater crime than repudiation; and I believe now, as I believed then, that for the Government of the United States to require its debtors—bonded debtors or otherwise—to pay more than is due is extortion.

But hear my answer further. What are the conditions now? The very moment that this gold standard is established and by this bill is settled, every dollar in the United States is gold. Your greenbacks are gold, your silver is gold, your subsidiary coin is gold. Why so? Because upon the simple gold standard when they go out gold must come in for them, and people, even under the gold standard, would in many instances rather have the subsidiary silver or the greenbacks in preference to the gold. Silver and greenbacks will still be used, but the standard by which they are measured is gold. It legally follows, therefore, that unless these bonds are repudiated they must be paid in gold, as all other debts are paid, so that there is no strain of extortion in the transaction. Let me elucidate that by a simple illustration. Yesterday morning I went to a store. I happened to have a twenty-dollar gold piece. I parted with it at once for greenbacks and for small silver coin. One day recently, in a bank, I saw the bank officers approach a man who had loaned them $1,600, and who was holding the bank's note at 4 per cent interest. The bank officers said: "You must take your money. We would rather pay our debt in gold than to pay the 4 per cent interest." The gold was paid, the notes taken up, and the bank relieved of the 4 per cent interest. At any time within the last fifteen years prior to 1898, 8 per cent could have been obtained anywhere. So that the increased volume under the gold standard has reduced the rate of interest.

But, recurring to the suggestion of the gentleman about my views as expressed when the Teller resolution was before the House, it should be kept in mind we have now but one kind of money. It must of necessity apply to all bonds made before this and made now. Why, you have got but one sort of money to pay them in. I thought when I first looked at this bill there ought to have been this provision in it: "Provided, That the bonds executed and issued before the passage of this bill shall be paid in coin." But that was a surface view of it. I had not thought about it in the right light. I was like the gentleman who asked me the question a while ago. With his immense intellect, he has not made use of it, because if he will just reflect a little he will see that you have got but one money now with which to pay anything, and you can not pay for a drink of whisky anywhere now in the United States except you pay in gold or money measured by gold. [Laughter.] And so when you come to examine it you will see that it must apply to everything—to bonds past, present, and future. And the great mind of the President presents an equity in favor of the bondholder. We sold these for gold. What wrong is there in paying gold for them?

Mr. SIMS. If all contracts are payable in gold under existing law, and if this language in the present bill specifying that they are to be paid in gold is mere surplusage and useless, then why put it in there if debts are already payable in gold?

Mr. LINNEY. Why, it was put in, I suppose, to strengthen the credit of the United States and to make the bonds more readily salable.

Mr. SIMS. Then there is a suspicion—

Mr. LINNEY (continuing). It appears in the face of the paper. They put in the face of the paper the voice of the law.

Mr. SIMS. Then there is a suspicion that under the existing law they might be paid in silver, which might affect their value.

Mr. LINNEY. None in the world. For you could state nothing but the truth, and it just states it. A great government can only state the truth, and it is not ashamed to state the truth. [Applause.] Therefore they put to be discharged in gold, and every bond as a necessary legal inference and legal result is also to be discharged in gold. So that I saw the foundation on which I stood was too metaphysical—does not exist and can not exist with the gold standard. What was my duty? Why, my duty was to cease to act upon a faulty argument that any man who will reflect a moment can see through.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one other idea yet about this matter. I think that these wonderful results have been accomplished under the present law. Well, let us apply a little bit of cornfield reasoning, as they say in my country, to that. The present law has accomplished these wonderful results. The present law has met the demands of increased population, has met the increased diversified industries and everything of that sort; and it is wonderful. There are in my State two streams, the Catawba and the Yadkin, running through it with laughing, rippling waters, and they both run over 50 miles. I suppose in these streams there are at least 500 shoals.

These splendid shoals and the countries immediately around them have been inhabited only by the bat and owl ever since man existed and ever since the morning stars sang together. What is the condition now? Industry has been stirred up; new life has been given; more money has come into the country and more labor found good employment at higher wages, and capitalists are seeking investments in that country on those shoals, until now in all that large area we have fabulous prices, thousands, tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands of dollars in some instances, offered for the barren rocks and sterile hills in the Catawba and Yadkin valleys for shoals that have lain there from the foundation of the world to the present without turning a spindle or yielding a solitary cent for the State of North Carolina. It is not an extravagant dream picture to expect that within the next ten years, under the stimulating effect of the system of revenue and finance now existing, millions of dollars will be invested there by sound-money capitalists to bless and cheer the noble boys of Carolina by opening up new lines of hope founded in the existence of these great enterprises.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of these wonderful results, surpassing in realization the wildest dreams of the most enthusiastic American that now exists or anything ever thought of, we have an idea of what has been accomplished. But the suggestion has been made during this discussion that if all this has happened or resulted from the present revenue or financial policy of the Administration, why pass this bill; why not let well enough alone? The answer is this: Much as the existing law has accomplished, still better results are within our reach.

There is an infirmity in the system as it now exists. Who has pointed it out? Both parties in this country have pointed it out. President Cleveland pointed it out. I believe he was the author of the expression "the endless chain," was he not? Since that time President McKinley has pointed it out, and the experts of finance in this country, the business men, who are most interested in maintaining the highest business activity, have analyzed it, and they say that this is the only infirmity the system possesses to-day. This bill is intended to correct this infirmity and make it a perfect system. To do so we remove the infirmity; and it is the salvation of the South and West. I do not see how any Southern or Western man can hesitate to give his vote to, or how any North Carolinian can think of voting against, this proposition.

Here is a proposition that allows communities in the South and West having only 2,000 population to organize banks on a capital, I believe, of $25,000. The present law requires a minimum of $50,000. So it works it down. Why, we had State banks. By some they were considered good things. That unquestionably was a mistake; but when you can organize a national bank on a capital of $25,000 that is absolutely secure, the State bank will be a thing of the past, and our people will resort to these new facilities—increased facilities—of being furnished with abundant supply of money by reason of this new banking provision here. Without this provision in favor of the people who do not live in the great centers of wealth—the South and West—the national banks possibly had it in their power to contract the currency. With this new feature the tooth of usury and extortion can not bite too much.

Mr. Chairman, the wisdom of the revenue and financial policy of the Government no longer rests on theory. It has been put in operation. The machine has been tested not in a "laboratory," as Adams said, but by being commanded to answer satisfactorily the demands of the business requirements of 76,000,000 of living souls for the last ten years. Our Democratic brethren can not now with any show of reason or fair play criticize it. When the new machine was launched, they with commendable industry and intelligence searched for mischiefs which they imagined lurked within it. Each and every one imagined that he had discovered its entire unfitness for the great work of restoring business life to the country, but they also had the manhood then to admit that if it proved a success they had nothing more to say.

The conservative clear leader of the Democratic side now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], denied that any increase of prosperity would ever be felt. It would be an interesting bit of history to collect all the interrogations they put almost every day in this House. "Where is your promised prosperity? The increase has not touched us yet."

In a speech delivered in this House by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] even as late as the 25th of January, 1898, that cool-headed statesman said:

I believe it will be admitted by all economists everywhere that there can be no general prosperity.

From this and hundreds and thousands of declarations closely akin to it, made by the illustrious leader's associates, the inference is irresistible that they were willing then to bow to the results of a trial of these laws. That trial has been had. The wisdom of the laws proven, and now they refuse to bow to the truth and will not be comforted. Not only has actual experiment overturned their position, but the voice of the people of these United States at the last general election was as potential as the results of an actual trial. The gentleman from New York, Mr. DINGGS, a Democrat, informed his colleagues as to the extent of the verdict of the people of these United States on this question in the following language, which I read from page 250 of the RECORD of this session:

The popular majority throughout the whole Union—600,000—against us was the greatest ever recorded against any party in this country. Above all else the Democracy has to-day not a governor, not a State legislature, not a United States Senator in or from any State north of Virginia and Kentucky or east of the Mississippi River. No such condition of affairs existed before in our political history, for in the war election of 1864 New Jersey, Delaware, and Kentucky held true to the Democracy and several Democratic governors and legislatures were elected. Even in the disastrous Greeley campaign of 1872 Delaware cast its vote for the regular Democratic candidate, Mr. Hendrix. The year 1896 was indeed a disastrous year for the Democracy.

If, Mr. Chairman, an actual trial of the policy of the Administration with the most glorious results, coupled with the verdict of the people (for the recent State elections are more pronounced in favor of the Administration even than the picture drawn by the gentleman from New York), does not satisfy the Democratic members of this House that they were and are in error, there is poor encouragement, indeed, for anyone to offer them any further proof of the wisdom both of the revenue and financial policy of the Administration. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill may be regarded as more thoroughly representing the party policy of the Republican party than any other which could have come before the House in any other way. It comes not simply with the indorsement of a majority of a committee composed of 17 members, but as the result of the unanimous voice of the entire Republican membership of the House, as shown in their party caucus.

This bill is not as innocent as at first blush it appears. It provides that the standard unit "shall, as now, be the gold dollar." If this is true, why assert it. A careful reading of the bill and a little reflection, however, will convince one that its consequences and effect are intended to be most far-reaching. I have ever deprecated any attempt to arraign one class of our people against another, but this is class legislation of the purest kind. It is brimful of benefits to the creditor class. There is not in this bill one single provision in the interest of the debtor. I am not one to arraign the debtor against the creditor or vice versa, but I do desire and demand that the one class shall be treated with the same consideration as the other.

In this bill the creditor's property is magnified and the value of his holdings increased. An increased value is added to the value of the United States bonds already outstanding, and valuable concessions are extended to the national banks, while their burdens are lightened. I am opposed to this bill because you have literally followed the saying, "To him that hath shall be given, and to him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

The first section provides that the "standard and unit of value shall, as now, be the gold dollar." The committee who formulated the bill says:

By the first and second sections of the bill which is here recommended it is sought to legalize the gold standard by a plain and definite statute, which will remove the question from all doubt and so establish the standard that it can be changed only by Congressional action, in this way giving the people's purpose the vitality of public law.

This shows that, notwithstanding the bold statement in the bill that the standard unit of value is now the gold dollar, it has never been so declared by law. On the contrary, Congress has solemnly declared that it was not. The Stanley Matthews resolution, which passed this House on the 28th day of January, 1878, under a suspension of the rules, declared as follows:

Whereas, by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1860, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars, of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith, nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

It is clearly to be seen that the gold dollar has never been recognized as the only money in which the Government could pay its debts, and the construction of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay only in gold was unauthorized.

We deny that it is the "people's purpose" that this gold dollar, as the sole unit of value, should now have "the vitality of public law." It may be and is "the purpose" of the bondholders and banks, but not necessarily of the people.

Section 2 provides that—

All interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States, as defined in section 1 of the act.

These obligations of the United States are now all payable in coin; by which is meant gold or silver coin, at the option of the Government. They were all placed upon the market and sold upon that construction. When the Cleveland Administration was forced to issue bonds, President Cleveland asked Congress to permit the bonds to be written payable in gold, and stated that the bonds could be sold at a higher rate and realize to the Treasury many millions of dollars more, the amount being estimated at about $16,000,000. Congress rejected the proposition, and the bonds were sold, as all others have been to the present time, payable in coin.

During the present Administration $200,000,000 of bonds, payable in coin, were sold at par, and those who were fortunate enough to have idle capital by them to purchase these bonds were able to dispose of them the same day at an increase of 5 per cent. A clear gift of $10,000,000 of the people's money. No wonder the moneyed classes of this country continually do cry for bonds, more bonds.

The amount of bonds now outstanding, all payable in coin, to be hereafter payable in gold under this bill, is $1,182,149,050. As a matter of fact, many of these millions were sold for greenbacks when they were worth less than par, many at par, some above par. But supposing only the ratio, as stated by President Cleveland, will be added by this bill declaring that they should be paid in gold, the amount that will be given to the holders of these bonds will be in excess of half a hundred million of dollars. Why this donation to the holders of the Government bonds without one iota of concession by them? Under this system of legislation Government bonds would continue to be good paying investments if they carried no interest. It is no secret that the bond-holding portion of the country are, to a very large extent, adherents of the party in power, and dominate and control it.

Sections 3 and 4 provide for the division of issue and redemption and the issue of gold bonds at the discretion of the Treasury. These sections provide, in effect, that the silver certificates, silver coin, United States notes, and Treasury notes, now outstanding, may be redeemed in gold, and when so redeemed shall not be reissued except for gold. The present law provides, not that said notes may be again paid out, but shall be. Mr. Cleveland argued that because the holders of the notes could go to the Treasury and get gold for them and that the Government had again to pay them out, when the same process might be gone over, it was an endless chain, and urged that it was necessary to stop it by a change in the law.

I with diffidence submit that this is not the correct view. It is no more an endless chain than any other class of money would be, and there is no more danger from it. After these notes are covered into the Treasury the only way they can get out is as money, in pursuance of appropriations made by law and in payment of the debts of the Government. It is now proposed to take from the Government the right to pay its debts with these notes, only the right remaining of exchange for gold. The ultimate effect of this will be to withdraw from circulation all of the silver certificates now outstanding—

Amounting to.....	$394,292,800
Silver dollars.....	71,361,740
United States notes.....	346,681,016
Treasury notes.....	87,441,680

forcing a contraction of the currency of over $800,000,000.

What a change does this make in currency legislation in a few years! Up to 1873 we had the free coinage of silver as well as gold. The Bland-Allison Act was passed February 28, 1878, to coin not less than $2,000,000 per month. This was followed by the Sherman law, July 14, 1890, repealed in 1893, under which the Government purchased and put in circulation annually, in payment of its debts, about $54,000,000. Under these laws the circulating medium was very largely increased. The Sherman law was repealed in 1893, and now this bill will in time retire what is already issued of this vast sum and withdraw it from circulation.

Much of the money of the people is to be destroyed, and this is to be accomplished by the authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury, unlimited as to amount, to sell gold bonds whenever he thinks it necessary to effect this planned contraction of the currency. We are to have the currency contracted, but the circulation of bonds increased. Increasing the bonds and contracting the currency seems to be the prevailing policy of the party in power.

The power to sell the bonds of the Government is too serious and fraught with too great consequences to be lodged with any one man. Congress alone should have this power. Its members are the servants of the people, and to them they would be answerable. But to whom would the Secretary of the Treasury be answerable for an error of judgment? If we were sure that all Secretaries of the Treasury would be the purest, best, and most disinterested of men (rather a violent presumption), this power would be too great to give to any one man. High-minded pure men are influenced by their associates and their surroundings. Frequently the president of some great banking institution is at the head of the Treasury Department of this Government. Trained in the banking business, he naturally looks at everything from the banker's point of view.

Sections 8 and following are the provisions containing the concessions to the national banks, and are a step in the direction of the Republican policy that the Government should not only cease to issue paper money to circulate among the people, but should give that vast and valuable privilege to the national banks. These national banks are required to purchase United States bonds to the extent of one-fourth of their capital; but there is no limit to the maximum amount. These bonds are to be deposited with the Treasurer, who is to deliver to said banks bank notes to the par value of said bonds. Under the operation of this law a national bank with a capital of $1,000,000 could deposit a million dollars of bonds with the United States Treasury, upon which it would draw interest, and in addition would receive from the Treasury $1,000,000 in bank notes, which it could lend out and for the use of which it would receive its usual discount. If all of these notes were kept in circulation the banks would thus receive double interest on the amount it had invested. The only tax the bank is required to pay to the Government is one-fifth of 1 per cent on the value of its franchise, "as measured by the aggregate of its capital, surplus, and undivided profits."

Not one cent upon the bank notes, which are printed and furnished at the expense, and the payment of which is guaranteed by the Government, without any consideration whatever. Why should this be done? Why should the Government abdicate its sovereign right to issue the money of the country? Why surrender to the moneyed power this mighty engine for good or evil to the people?

It is stated that while this bill was being considered by the Republican caucus one of the leaders said that he objected to the increased concessions to national banks, and gave as a reason that he was himself the holder of stocks in two national banks, and he did not care to appear before his constituents as an advocate of these features favorable to national banks. It is presumable that as soon as the reasons were made known to his associates—many of whom, possibly, were equally fortunate—they all at once and with great accord approved these features as eminently meritorious and proper.

At the last Congress a banking bill known as the McCleary bill was reported to the House; its object was very similar to the present measure so far as it relates to banks. In effect it was to take from the Government the right to issue the paper money and give it to the banks. The bill was not pressed to a vote. The occasion was thought not to be ripe for it. But now this measure, more far-reaching and destructive in its consequences than the discarded McCleary bill, is proposed.

Apart from the great benefits accorded the national banks and the special favoritism shown them, what may we reasonably expect as the practical operation of the control and ownership by the banks of the entire paper money of the country?

Banking institutions are organized and managed for the money that can be made. In flush times its money will, as far as possible, be kept in circulation, and customers will be urged to keep the loans; but in times of panic, even of doubt and uncertainty, what will be the practice of the banks? They will demand their money. A tight money market will be made tighter, and many a man with plenty of property but little ready money will be forced to the wall and into bankruptcy. The tighter the market, the more urgent the demand of the banks for their money. Not so would the Government deal with the people. In times of panic and stringency in the money market it has put money in circulation by buying its bonds, lending money to banks, giving people employment on public works, and other ways; but all of this is to be changed, and by surrendering the right to issue the paper currency of the country we are to be turned over to the tender mercies of the national banks.

But we are told now is the time to make a change which we denounce as inimical to the best interests of our people. We are told that the country is prosperous, and the Republican party is lauding itself to the skies as the particular guardian, promoter, and protector not only of the public credit but of flush times. If we consider that the bonded indebtedness of the Government has increased in amount from $585,034,250, as of March 1, 1893, to almost double this immense sum, or $1,037,049,690, as of November 30, 1899, or an increase on an average of about $65,000,000 a year, one can form some idea of what the Republicans mean by prosperity. But to the holder of stock in trust combines, in national banks, and to the thousands of newly commissioned officers drawing salaries for service in the Spanish, Cuban, and Philippine wars it is flush times.

To the people who are the recipients of the difference in the expenditures of the Government in 1899, $605,072,179.05, over 1897, of $365,774,159.57, amounting to $239,298,019.48, it is flush times. Under the war-revenue bill about $150,000,000 have been taken in one year from the people. Two hundred million dollars have been borrowed upon the bonds of the people. All these vast sums wrung from the people, the bonds yet to be paid by them, make flush times for somebody. But where are the flush times for the farmer and the laborer? While the products he raises have to be sold in the open market at about the same price, the trust-protected products, fostered by the most outrageous and most unconscionable of all tariffs, have in some instances more than doubled in price.

Any spendthrift thinks he is prosperous as long as the money he has borrowed holds out, but how will it be when the money is exhausted and the day of reckoning comes? Will not the people turn from the false gods after whom they have been clamoring to the principles of an honest and economic administration of the Government; to Jeffersonian simplicity; to a reasonable standing army in times of peace; to the Monroe doctrine, confining ourselves to the Western Hemisphere, conceding the Eastern to the other nations of the earth; to the doctrine that the right to issue money and to declare the value thereof is an attribute of sovereignty and should be exercised only by the Government and not by corporate banks; to the sound proposition of a tax for revenue only, and not one that enables trust combinations to rob the people; to the reasonable demand that capital shall contribute its reasonable pro rata of taxation, by means of an income tax, to the expenses of the Government?

For these reforms we can only look to the Democratic party. Much extravagance and long lease of power have made the Republican party absolutely reckless and regardless of the rights of the people. They have surrendered at the behest and to the dictation of the great banks, trusts, and aggregations of capital which furnished the financial assistance which secured the Republican party's triumph in 1896. But an indignant people will shake off its indifference; they will be on their guard. Money will not have the power in 1900 that it had in 1896 to thwart the people's will. We know the attempt will be made, but forewarned is forearmed, and believing that "thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just," the Democracy, while entering the coming contest with a full realization of the immense financial resources of the Republican party, will prosecute the fight upon principle and with a determination that right and justice shall triumph.

Mr. COONEY. Mr. Chairman, last Friday, when the rule for the discussion of this bill was before the House, a very able gentleman on the other side of the Chamber took occasion to felicitate himself, his colleagues, and his party on the happy and merry attitude they hold toward this bill and legislation in general. He said:

Our past is behind us, our present conditions we are proud of, our future we feel to be assured.

There is every indication that the gentleman faithfully expressed the prevailing mental attitude of Republicans. They have reasonable ground for pleasure. We are just finishing up our Spanish war, in the progress of which, if disaster had at any time befallen our arms, that party in the absolute control of affairs could not have escaped the penalty due to its position. Our arms having achieved uninterrupted success, it is entitled to enjoy the felicity that is due to a party that holds the post of responsibility.

But, sir, I would warn Republican members that there is no reason for the exultant exhibition of joy that here gives evidence of the fact that they have reached that pinnacle of self-congratulation from which there is no ascent and there is a mighty fall.

"We rise to fortune by successive steps; we descend by only one." And I believe the enactment of this bill into law is that one step which Republicans are taking in their descent from power. I have heard of individuals who have laughed themselves to death and of those who died in the moment of their ecstasy. Violent delights have violent endings. Well-tempered assurance is always an element of success, but the cackinnation with which Republicans have dropped this "serpent's egg" in the House, and the glee with which they undertake to hatch it out, are certain symptoms of mortality.

This bill is a breaking of faith in its very foundation, and there is not a promise in the whole political life of the Republican party that does not sustain a fracture by the convulsion. "Our past is behind us" is an old and familiar announcement made by Republicans when they are about to crush the hopes they have created and violate the promises they have made. It is a favorite topic for their animadversion that the Democratic party holds to the past.

Sir, the past of this Republic is a great treasure house of the virtues and achievements of its most illustrious citizens. The men who built this Government and the principles that animated them still flash their light from out the past along the pathway of the present and the future. To the Democratic party the past is as alive with promises made to humanity as the future is pregnant with gifts to be revealed and enjoyed. To the Republican party the past is but a graveyard in which to bury broken vows and abandoned principles, and the funeral processions of that party never allow the dust to settle on the road to it.

For years the voters of the Republican party have had the gold standard pressed on them as the Old Testament of faith. It taught them the wisdom of John Sherman and all the great prophets of the single standard and parity. They had scarcely accepted it upon the conditions of the St. Louis platform when the veil of hypocrisy was rent in twain, and this bill is given to them as a New Testament of "currency reform," which they are to receive, on faith alone, as a revelation from a power higher than themselves. It will perhaps induce Republicans to receive it by having some knowledge of its antecedents.

The men who are sent here to legislate for the people could not make this bill. They did not know how to draft its provisions to meet the objects aimed at by those who desired the law. It was not made by Congress or any committee thereof, and for that reason may be the more acceptable to the people. A few men interested in national banks conceived it and drafted its provisions at Atlantic City last summer amidst the frivolities of fashion, the pomp of wealth, the gluttony of luxury, the conspiracy of greed, and all the heartless hilarity of a fashionable summer resort, where our plutocrats doth congregate. From then until this Congress met it was guarded from the public eye in that holiest of holies, the vault of a national bank. It was dispatched here in secrecy, and in secrecy its contents were revealed only to Republican members.

The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, who could not or would not draft this bill themselves, called a caucus to consider it. The caucus was resolved into a wild west show, in which their Buffalo Bills, already booted and spurred for the occasion, mounted and broke in all the mustangs and bronchos in the herd. They then convened in an old-fashioned protracted meeting, where the broken-spirited sinners were called to the mourners' bench to strengthen their newly-found faith in a final wrestle with their conscience and the national banker. I do not ask for the result of that spiritual wrestling match. In the case of a Republican member it is easily predicted, for where in one Testament it is written, "Resist the devil and he will flee from you," in this new testament of "currency reform" it is written, "Resist the banker and he will go for you."

Sir, I anticipate that the martial wave upon whose crest Republicans build their hope for the future will find in this bill the rock on which it will split. They have turned their back on their own party and its declared principles, and without authority from the people or necessity from the condition of the times they propose to revolutionize the finances of the country, and for the sole profit of a class to permanently install institutions that were originally created only for temporary purposes. The national bank means a national debt. Is the Republican party getting ready to perpetuate and increase our national debt?

If this bill stopped with the legal establishment of the gold standard it might possess the fair appearance of authority from the platform on which the present administration was elevated to power. The gold standard is now and has been for many years in practical operation in this country, not by force of law, but against it. It has been put in force and maintained by the policy of the respective administrations. They could with absolute legal authority have adopted and maintained a policy that would have destroyed the gold standard and substituted that of bimetalism. But the policy adopted was ratified by the Republican convention of 1896. Under certain limitation that convention declared for the then existing gold standard, but its smile of approbation did not extend a hair's breadth further.

The first two sections of this bill make legal what was before considered by many as illegal; they establish the gold standard absolutely and beyond cavil. But these two sections constitute only a one-ninth part of this bill. What is the subject of legislation treated of by the other eight-ninths? The establishment of the gold standard? Not in any particular. Eight-ninths of the bill is wholly devoted to the construction of a legal framework within which the Secretary of the Treasury can, and is invited to, wipe out the last vestige of our paper currency and replace it with the paper issue of the national banks.

The power that this bill gives to redeem and impound our currency, to mix, exchange, and shuffle up the various funds like a pack of cards in the hands of a professional gambler, to issue and sell Government bonds, to create and extend national banks and force an increase of their paper issue upon the people, is all left absolutely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to judge the times and occasions when to act with dispatch and move in harmony with the spirit of this bill to the ultimate change in our currency and to the realization of the happiest golden dream of the national bank.

The disposition of the Secretary of the Treasury in the use of the immense discretion and powers given him in this bill can be predicted from his past history. He is himself a national banker, and for years he has officiated as high priest to currency reformers. In 1894, to those who were aiming to "tinker" with the currency under Cleveland, he wrote the following from his national bank in Chicago:

I believe the "Baltimore plan" carries the true principles of a credit currency, but we can not reach it by any step, and years may intervene before it could be realized. In the meantime the way of the Government to step out of the currency business and place the burden of redemption on the banks is plain—authorize the issue of $50,000,000 of 2½ per cent bonds payable at such time as Congress may elect (twenty-five years desirable), to be offered to subscribers at par. Accept in payment United States legal-tender notes or Treasury notes, the same to be canceled. Amend the national bank act so that banks can obtain note issue to the face value of bonds deposited as security for circulation. Reduce the tax on circulating notes to one-half of 1 per cent. This done, national bank notes would make good the vacuum caused by the retirement of Government notes. The problem is this: To take the Government out of the note-issuing business.

And again, a year before the election of McKinley, Mr. Gage, in a speech before a currency-reform club of bankers in Chicago, said:

Our whole monetary system is the resultant of makeshift legislation and unscientific compromises. It is time that reform began. I do not assume here to offer final remedies. In my own opinion the greenbacks should be permanently retired. The silver purchased under the Sherman act should be gradually sold and the Treasury notes redeemed and canceled. Some well-guarded system of bank-note circulation, broader and more elastic than the present national bank act provides, should be inaugurated.

To sum up, the defects of our present currency system are: (1) A confusing heterogeneity, which needs simplification. (2) The greenback controversy the principle of paper money. (3) The Treasury note is a standing evidence of a foolish operation; it lies open to the just charge of being both idiotic and immoral. (4) The national bank note nearly conforms to the true principle of paper money. (5) The silver certificate encourages the use of silver to a larger extent than consists with the safe preservation of that metal on a parity with gold.

I read the foregoing expressions of faith, belief, and purposes of the man who now rules our finances—expressions made public by him years before McKinley selected him as the representative of his financial policy—to make it clear what construction is now to be placed on the provisions of this bill. From Mr. Gage's point of view there is not a single defect in our currency but what this bill will eliminate; that part of our currency he said destroy this bill destroys; what he advised as a substitute it substitutes, and in its iconoclasm it goes further and hastens the retirement of the silver dollar by providing for its redemption in gold. Clearer than any explanation that has yet been given by those who espouse the cause of this bill in this House; briefer, more pointed, with less humbug, and with less confusion of intelligence as to its purposes, Mr. Gage has already placed his construction on the bill; and he will not shirk a duty that is so pleasant to him as enforcing all its provisions at every opportunity.

Mr. Gage is not a politician. He is neither a Republican, a Democrat, a mugwump, nor a copperhead, but at different times he has been each and all of them. In every position his politics and religion have been the intrenchment and perpetuation of the national banking system in this country. He bolted the Republican party in 1892 and labored for the election of Cleveland for the purpose of securing the repeal of the Sherman law and driving another rivet of strength into the gold standard. He assisted at the birth of the Baltimore plan and was in constant consultation with Cleveland, Carlisle, and Springer, devising means to bring that plan before Congress and forcing it on the country. That scheme came tumbling down upon him and for the moment buried him out of sight beneath its ruins.

When MARK HANNA came along in 1896 he rescued him from the débris and started him forth again to organize the national bankers into a phalanx of taxgatherers, which, in aid of McKinley's election, collected the biggest corruption fund that the world has ever seen to buy place or power for any man. He is now the ambassador at the McKinley court for all those incorporated organisms that deal in the earnings of credit, stocks, bonds, and mortgages, the elements that are most directly interested in the total destruction of silver as money, the absolute maintenance of the gold standard, and the complete substitution of national-bank paper for our present currency. They belong to no political party permanently; no party can purchase them; they are not on the market for sale, but to buy. They purchase political parties themselves.

Their connection at the present time with the Republican party can scarcely be said to have been formed on the basis of an alliance. They spent too much time and money to effect the success of that party and that party has broken too many of its pledges to the people to rebut the presumption that it is acting under force in supporting this bill. The people, whose servants we are, have not seen this bill. Its provisions have never been discussed by them, nor in any form has the change of our currency for that of a national-bank paper been passed upon by them. No party has ever submitted that question to its constituents. On the hustings and elsewhere Republicans have been charged with secretly harboring this design, but it was indignantly denied as often as charged.

One of the most familiar and potent arguments of Republican orators in favor of the gold standard during the campaigns of 1896 and 1898 was that it preserved the greenbacks, Treasury notes, and our other forms of currency intact; that it made each dollar of them equal to a dollar in gold. You told them that you wanted the gold standard to make their old historic greenback equal to gold; you did not tell them that you also wanted to retire the greenback. Why didn't you?

In considering this bill it would be well to keep before our eye the kind, quantity, and character of our currency that it marks out for slaughter. I take the report of the Treasury Department for December 1, 1899, which shows the outstanding currency in circulation on that date to be as follows:

Gold coin.....	$627,480,101
Standard silver dollars.....	78,232,454
Subsidiary silver.....	76,322,965
Gold certificates.....	150,908,202
Silver certificates.....	394,232,800
Treasury notes (act July 14, 1890).....	87,441,680
United States notes (greenbacks).....	317,811,976
Currency certificates (act June 8, 1872).....	13,005,000
National-bank notes.....	239,835,786
Total.....	1,985,930,964

Here is what this bill is calculated by degrees, but eventually, to eliminate from the foregoing:

Standard silver dollars.....	$78,232,454
Silver certificates.....	394,232,800
Treasury notes (act July 14, 1890).....	87,441,680
United States notes (greenbacks).....	317,811,976
Currency certificates (act June 8, 1872).....	13,005,000
Total.....	891,383,910

This amounts to nearly one-half of the currency available for circulation. It is that part of the currency which does in fact circulate and upon which falls the chief burden of exchange and business of the people; for if we add to this the subsidiary coinage and national-bank notes, amounting to $316,158,751, we would have $1,207,542,661 as the total sum of the currency that enters into practical circulation.

The two other so-called media of circulation in the Treasury statement as outstanding and in circulation, namely, gold coin and gold certificates, circulate intermittently and on crutches. They have a peculiar and very valuable use of their own as reserves and deposits for banks and individuals, but it is not the money that circulates among the people; and it may be well to say here that the $627,480,101 in gold said to be in circulation is not correct, but is the amount which has been coined from the foundation of the United States Mint, and is not now held as reserve in the Treasury.

The statement does not subtract the amount that during a long period of years has been lost, exported, or used in the arts. Now, the exercise of the power given in this bill to redeem and retire $891,383,910 of our currency must have one of two results—Government bonds must be issued as a basis for national banks to supply the vacuum in our country, or there must be an immense contraction in the currency, either one of which will be a national evil that will approach to a national curse; and I defy any man to show a different result.

The chief object of the bill is, as Mr. Gage before this expressed it: "To take the Government out of the note-issuing business."

By which he means that the Government shall stop issuing anything in the nature of paper currency and turn that privilege wholly over to the national banks. Out of all these millions of currency there are only $239,835,786 that are issued by the national banks, and represent a debt upon which they can draw interest from the Government, while $891,383,910, representing silver money and Government notes, is active, running at large and popular with the people, issued by the Government, and not producing a single cent of usury to the national banks.

When the currency robber looks on that $891,383,910, carrying blessings to humble homes, animating with hope the toil-worn paths of labor, thrusting the torch of comfort into the dark corners of wretchedness and poverty, and maintaining its mission of love and charity, absolutely free from the finger of the usurer, thoughts come over him like those that came to General Blucher, when, after the battle of Waterloo, he was taking in the sights of London. That city so impressed the old freebooter, with its "confusing heterogeneity" of wealth and splendor, that he was constrained to remark to his English guide, "Mine Gott, vat a vine city to sack!"

If the American people can be induced to issue $891,383,910 of Government bonds with which to retire this currency, then the national banks will have a basis for circulating their own notes and the best investment on earth for $891,383,910 of their capital. The prospect which now invites their perseverance is the most alluring that has tempted the imagination since that which struck the gaze of Christ from the mount to which the devil took him. In a country the richest and greatest the sun ever shone upon, where royalty is unknown, the national bank, tempted by the same old devil, aims to enthrone itself as absolute monarch and quarter its stockholders permanently upon the people's wealth and enterprise.

The national bank is the organized power that gives life and movement to this conspiracy against the people. It has many and powerful allies, who, on account of fear, favor, or connection, are in sympathy with all its objects. Its attitude to-day makes it easy to understand the indignation of Jefferson when he declared that a national bank was more dangerous to the liberties of the people than a hostile army; and how Andrew Jackson was prompted to set his iron heel on the neck of the old national bank and grind the life out of it.

Ever since the present national bank was organized down to the present time it has been a disturbing element in our finance. It is not too much to say that did it not exist the people would have been saved from the bitter strifes and disastrous results of the conflict that has been waged on the money question during the past twenty-six years. No one can examine the many conflicts and acts of Congress on money, finance, and currency without being impressed with the irrepressible strife that has been waged between it and the people for supremacy over the nation's currency.

Through all this strife, whether waged on silver, gold, bonds, currency, or other kindred subject, it has been animated by but one unceasing purpose, and that is, to grasp from the hands of the Government the constitutional power of issuing currency for the people and exercising that power exclusively by itself. That "confusing heterogeneity which needs simplification," as Mr. Gage terms our existing currency, has been brought about by that very conflict. It is the epitomized history of the strife, and in it can be read what the people have preserved and what their enemy has gained. And I challenge the whole history of that conflict for an instance where the national-bank power has been successful in changing the law of our money or currency that has not been followed by disaster, depression, panic, or individual ruin from which there was no recovery until such action was reversed or its force broken by some remedial act.

Whatever is legal tender is, for all practical purposes, money in our currency. It will buy what each one wants, and, what is more to the purpose, the creditor is bound to accept it in discharge of his debt. Besides gold, we now have a billion legal-tender dollars for circulation with which every man can pay his debts everywhere. This bill provides that it shall retain the same legal-tender quality; but when, under the provisions of the bill, it is redeemed and retired from circulation, what is to take its place? Republicans laugh at such a simple inquiry and answer that if redeemed in gold, as provided in this bill, the gold will take its place in circulation. That is an evasive answer. Gold will not circulate when men deal in it as a commodity to make commissions and profits and collect it for purposes of reserve.

As I observed before, the purpose is to replace it with national-bank notes. National-bank notes are not a legal tender, nor does this bill provide them with that quality. If, then, our present currency is changed to a national-bank currency, the people will have nothing with which to pay their debts but this bank currency. That the creditor is not bound to receive. John Smith has given William Brown a mortgage on his farm. When interest day comes, John gathers up $100 in national-bank notes—there is nothing else in circulation—and takes it to William to pay his interest. William refuses to accept it. Why? Because it is not a legal tender. John says to William, "Take them; they are just as good as gold. We now have the gold standard; you can get them redeemed in gold, dollar for dollar." "I know that," says William, "but I do not have to take those notes, but you go and get them redeemed in gold and bring it to me; I will have to take the gold." John goes to town, enters the national bank, presents his $100 of bank paper and calls for gold in exchange. The banker looks at the notes and says, "Well, Mr. Smith, these notes have not been issued by this bank. One of them was issued by the First National Bank of New Orleans, one by the First National Bank of St. Paul, one by the First National Bank of San Francisco, and the others by the First National Bank of Boston. I have no doubt but if you present these notes at the respective banks that issued them they will redeem them in gold; or you might take all of them to the United States Treasury and have them redeemed in bulk. If, however, it is inconvenient for you to make the trip, there is old Money Bags around the corner, who will pay you the gold for them at a reasonable discount."

That is an illustration of what is made possible in ordinary transactions by the provisions of the bill you now aim to make law, when under it our present legal-tender currency shall have been wiped out and the gold-redeemable nonlegal-tender paper money of the bank is substituted in its stead. It is the glory of our present currency that there is sufficient legal tender in it to save the people from the expenses and inconvenience of redemption in the free use of it in their transactions.

The national-bank notes now pass without exception and as freely as our legal-tender currency, but that is the result, to a considerable extent, of the fact that its quantity is small in comparison with the legal-tender currency, is redeemable in a large part of that currency, and is sustained and carried along by the force of its relation to the whole volume of currency. When it becomes practically the sole currency, depending upon gold redemption at inconvenient places, it will not, under the law as it now exists, nor when this bill becomes law, stand the storms of depression and panics.

It may be that future legislation will change the quality of the national-bank note and make it a legal tender. I apprehend that the American people will never be satisfied with a currency that is less than legal tender. If the national-bank note is made a legal tender, it is then no better than our present currency, while at the same time the people will have to pay for it in millions of bonds and interest.

That part of the currency which you aim to destroy you have stigmatized as fiat money. Our support of it you declare to be Populism. We are proud of the accusation. There is but one system that is free from fiat. That is where there is a dollar of real money or bullion held in reserve to redeem every dollar of paper money permitted to circulate. If $3 of paper currency is permitted to circulate upon $1 of redemption money, there is $1 of fiat money in circulation.

This dollar may sustain its power of exchange by legislation, by confidence, by methods of business, or otherwise, for an hour, a day, a year, or forever, but so long as it circulates it carries with it the quality of irredeemability, of fiatism, which in our currency has been an object of aversion to national banks and now of ridicule by Republicans. There does not and there can not exist among a civilized people a system of currency without more or less of such fiatism in it. When this fiatism is placed in the currency issued by the Government the national banker hates it; when it is injected into his own national-bank currency he loves it.

This fiatism can not be eliminated from our financial system. The presumption of irredeemability, even if limited in time, must to a large and increasing degree remain with that system. It may be shifted from one part of the system to another, but it can not be taken out of it. No one knows that better than the national banker. It is the center of this whole financial struggle. It is the profit-producing part of the system. If it is left with the currency issued by the Government directly, all the people will reap profits; it saves them from Government bonds—a perpetual national indebtedness and the payment of interest to the national banks.

If the national banks can transfer that fiatism to their own paper issue and into a national bonded indebtedness, which they will surely hold, then they and their successors for all time to come will reap the profits. This bill makes that transfer. It enlarges the opportunity for fiatism in the hands of the bankers, while it makes the whole system dangerous and top-heavy by making gold alone the basis of redemption.

So far as the gold-standard feature of this bill is concerned, I am opposed to it. No matter what events have changed the opinions of gentlemen on the other side of this House within the last few years, to my mind there are no grounds for discussion and debate on that subject. If gentlemen have changed, the Constitution has not. The adoption of the gold standard by this Government has been effected by a long campaign of organized corruption.

In that campaign many a "needy hired man" has made his fortune at the expense of his country and his conscience. Many a metropolitan newspaper has been kept upon its legs by the sale of corrupt opinions. Ministers of state and persons in high political positions have been financially profited, and there has not been an impecunious scoundrel who has sold his services to the gold trust but has become wealthy or advanced to political, professional, or commercial position to keep him from want.

Even this Republican Administration reaches out the helping hand to those two ragged and hungry fugitives and tramps from the Democratic party, William Bynum and Josiah Patterson, and places them in some of the most profitable positions in the Government because they were the more serviceable that they were traitors.

I congratulate the people of the United States on the heroic and protracted struggle they have made for financial freedom and that this is the last of all the great nations to succumb to the corruption and injustice by which the gold standard has been everywhere enacted into law. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ZENOR. Mr. Chairman, the Republican party, in its St. Louis platform in 1896, declared against the free coinage of silver—except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world—

Which it pledged itself to "promote." It further declared that—until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved, and all our silver and paper currency must be maintained at parity with gold.

It further and lastly, and as a corollary to what precedes, declared that the party would favor—all measures designed to maintain inviolably the obligations of the United States, and all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard, the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth.

Mr. Chairman, in this plank of the Republican platform it was and is now assumed that the country was and is upon the gold standard, and with this knowledge and the experience of more than forty-six years of the actual operation and effect of this policy—for the distinguished gentleman from the State of Iowa, Mr. DOLLIVER, and others upon that side of the Chamber have declared in the course of this discussion that the gold standard which is now proposed to be crystallized into statutory law has virtually been in force since 1853, and my distinguished colleague, Mr. OVERSTREET, from Indiana, says it has been recognized in practice for more than half a century—with all this knowledge and experience, the Republican party felt called upon when it assembled in national convention at St. Louis in 1896 to emphasize the fact that the gold standard was not satisfactory, and in language and phraseology deliberately and carefully chosen explicitly declared their preference for bimetalism and pledged their party in the most solemn manner to use every honorable means to secure its reestablishment by an international agreement. Opposed to this declaration was the declaration of the Democratic party, in these words:

We demand the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation. We demand that the standard silver dollar shall be a legal tender equally with gold for all debts, public and private, and we favor such legislation as will prevent for the future the demonetization of any kind of legal-tender money by private contract.

This is not all. We went still further. We declared—

We are opposed to the policy and practice of surrendering to the holders of the obligations of the United States the option reserved by law to the Government of redeeming such obligations in either silver or gold coin.

With the positions of the two parties thus defined and along the lines thus drawn the great contest upon this question was waged in 1896. I dare say that if the Republican party in that contest had declared that in order to preserve the alleged existing gold standard it was necessary to retire the greenbacks or impound them in the United States Treasury and substitute for them national-bank notes and redeem the silver dollars or silver certificates with gold, as has since been advocated and is now openly avowed, and especially if its leaders, advocates, and champions had announced their purpose, if elected, to reverse the unbroken practice of the Government for more than eighty years of its proudest history and to crystallize into law the usurpations and vicious practices inaugurated by the Secretaries of the Treasury of later years, without warrant and in defiance of the plain letter of the statute, by the passage of such a measure as the pending bill, Mr. McKinley would not have carried a half dozen States of the Union.

The President in his first message told the country our money was all now perfectly good, but that "currency reform" was needed to remove alleged doubts and ambiguities in our financial system. He signally failed, however, to point out the defects supposed to exist, and he proposed no plan of reform, but contented himself with calling attention to the scheme of his Secretary of the Treasury then pending, or soon thereafter introduced, before the House Committee on Banking and Currency.

He neither indorsed, criticised, nor disapproved it. He must have known what the commission of the monetary convention of Indianapolis proposed. He could not have been ignorant of the plans of currency reform introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Walker, and the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. FOWLER, and Mr. McCLEARY, of Minnesota; and yet the President publicly expressed no opinion about any of them. He said in his banquet speech in New York City, shortly after his inauguration, that his interpretation of the victory of 1896 was that the people commissioned the Republican party "to enact such laws as would not permit a doubt to exist anywhere concerning the stability and integrity of our currency or the inviolability of our obligations of every kind."

If this was his view at that time and he was convinced that the remedy was the establishment of the gold standard, then it was his plain duty to put the money question to the front and to have had some measure of reform ready for submission to Congress. Instead of this, however, he sent a high-salaried commission abroad on a junketing tour to the capitals of Europe to secure foreign consent for us to do what we are well capable of doing for ourselves, and then called an extra session to reenact the McKinley tariff law to legislate the country prosperous. The result is not prosperity for the great mass of the people, but for trusts and monopolies, which have forced up the price of practically everything the farmers of the country are compelled to buy in the way of necessary supplies without a corresponding increase in the price of their products and what they have to sell, and an estimated deficit of more than $18,000,000 for the fiscal year ending 1901, with continued war taxes and probably more bond issues.

In his banquet speech the President dropped bimetallicism in international agreement and made no suggestion of what he thought ought to be done to "reform our currency." His whole address was nothing if not a well-formed and eloquent group of glittering generalities and pleasing platitudes. As Hamlet said to Polonius, "Words, words, words." He did not say the bonds or other obligations should be paid in gold, for fear of driving off the bimetallic Republicans, but said they must be paid in the "best money of the world," to hold his gold supporters. The President said:

Nothing should ever tempt us—nothing ever will tempt us—to scale down the sacred debt of the nation through a legal technicality. Whatever may be the language of the contract, the United States will discharge all of its obligations in the currency recognized as the best throughout the civilized world at the times of payment.

Mr. Chairman, this is remarkable language. The rights of the parties—the United States and the bondholders—are not to be determined by the terms of the contract; not even paid in our own money, whatever it may be at the time of payment, but in the money of other nations if it is thought to be "better" than ours! Shylock refused his principal and demanded his "pound of flesh" because it was "so nominated in the bond." The President proposed to give more than is "nominated in the bond," the "pound of flesh" cut from over the heart of the American people, blood and all!

And now his party proposes in the pending measure to carry out this policy and fasten upon the country the gold standard and thereby give to the owners of Government securities an unearned increment of millions of dollars. But when, without any submission of the question to the great mass of the people, like a similar contribution made to their greed and avarice in 1873, you have done this grateful service to the bondholders, it will arouse such a storm of indignation as will cause the modern Shylocks to exclaim with Shakespeare's prototype, "Give me my principal and let me go."

And in his later messages the President is even less explicit, if possible, than he has been on the currency question. He speaks no word of commendation of the views of his Secretary of the Treasury in his report to Congress, and contributes nothing of importance to help in forming public opinion on this momentous issue.

Secretary Gage and Comptroller Dawes have openly antagonized each other on the money question, which has doubtless led the President to be more guarded and less aggressive, looking out for the first chance to return to his first love and prepared for the opportune moment.

The truth is, the President has had no well-defined and fixed financial policy.

The President has really been in an uncomfortable dilemma on this money question. The record of his whole public life has been and is for silver. He voted for the Bland-Allison bill over the veto of President Hayes in 1878, and for the Matthews resolution of the same year, passed again by the Senate in February, 1898. He voted for the Sherman purchasing act of 1890, and was one of the most vigorous advocates of free silver on this floor. When his party surrendered to the money power at St. Louis he was confronted with this silver record, and first sought to have the platform avoid the use of the word "gold;" but his friends failing in this, his next and only remaining resort was to speak in vague generalities from his porch in Canton about "sound money" and "making every dollar as good as every other dollar."

But when the time for action comes his eloquent periods and captivating appeals upon the subject of sound money will not do, and he apparently has no plan. He has endeavored to placate his turbulent bimetallic friends in the form of promises to continue negotiations with other nations for bimetallicism, while his Secretary is known to have laughed at it as folly, and emphasizes his opposition to it by making the primary purpose of his financial bill "to commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard and remove as far as possible all doubts and fears on that point."

Secretary Gage seems to be of a different composition from his chief, and has omitted no occasion to define his views. In speeches and public interviews he has repeatedly declared that the only solution of our difficulties is the permanent establishment of the single gold standard. In his "statement" of December 17, 1897, before the House Committee on Banking and Currency, the Secretary said:

A bimetallic standard does not exist anywhere on earth. A bimetallic currency, as I understand bimetallicism, does exist in the United States now. The firm establishment of our system upon the gold standard and the recognition of silver by the Government in the way of such interchangeability as may be necessary to keep it equal to gold will better maintain bimetallicism on the general principle I have just outlined. This has, in a manner, been going on for eighteen or nineteen years. There is nothing at all in the proposition to more firmly establish the gold standard to prevent us from doing all reasonable things to accomplish such an increase in the value of silver money as will bring it to a natural parity with gold, and thus relieve the Government from the expense of artificial maintenance and the embarrassment which has prevailed for many years and which will perhaps prevail for many years to come in our financial system.

That is to say, what silver dollars we now have or may hereafter coin must be exchangeable or redeemable in gold, for which, perhaps, bonds will have to be issued to secure enough of it, in order to have a true bimetallic currency. This is the theory now sought to be enacted into law. For such bimetallicism, of course, no international arrangement would be necessary, because the ratio would be wholly immaterial.

But if there was any doubt at any time about the position of Secretary Gage on this subject, there could be none whatever about the position of the Indianapolis commission, which represented the gold wing of the Republican party as well as the Gold Democrats. In their report they said that the object of their plan was to remove all doubt at once and forever about the stability of our currency by establishing the gold standard in a permanent form; and to do this, among other things, they contended that the coinage of silver dollars must cease. They said:

Many of our fellow-citizens have hoped in all sincerity that the problem of the standard would be solved by international bimetallicism. An earnest effort has been made to realize that hope, but it must now be abandoned.

Senator WOLCOTT, one of the commission, in his speech in the Senate reviewing the work of the commission in that behalf, declared that he and his colleagues met a serious obstacle in their efforts to secure the cooperation of foreign nations for bimetallicism in the fact that it was believed that the United States did not really desire the success of the commission, and that this belief was founded on the expressed opinions in public interviews of Secretary Gage and minor official representatives of the Administration.

Mr. Chairman, the American people have a right to know whether there has been double dealing in this important matter. Has the President been "running with the hare and holding with the hounds?" Has he and his party been giving lip service to bimetallicism and secretly stabbing it? However this may be, it is certain that Secretary Gage has not disavowed any of the alleged interviews, nor has he withdrawn his bill or statements from the committee of the House, and he still remains the close friend and financial adviser of the President in the Cabinet.

To placate the suspicious silver Republicans, the President has removed Mr. Preston, Director of the Mint, who made bold to speak out on the futility and absurdity of any attempt to secure international bimetallicism; but this was a very weak "apology" to his clamorous silver followers of the Republican persuasion. The people will draw their own conclusions from these damaging facts, and the President and his party must answer to the country for their good faith in their attempt to redeem this pledge of their platform.

Why this sudden and almost hysterical cry for a "reform" of the currency and strengthening of the public credit? Where is the source of danger to the credit of the nation, and who is complaining of the currency? The President assures the country that all our money is perfectly good, and Secretary Gage informed us by a telegram to ex-Secretary Fairchild during the silver debate in the Senate in the winter of 1897-98 that the obligations of the Government were being paid indifferently in gold, silver, or paper, and this assurance has since been quite often repeated.

The gold reserve in the Treasury is about $240,000,000 and constantly increasing. The balance of trade is largely in our favor and gold is pouring into the country in quantities never before known in our history. The open and avowed purpose of the pending bill is to fasten the gold standard permanently on the country. The people of the country thoroughly understand the movement, and while powerless for the time to successfully resist the passage of the present vicious and revolutionary measure, the time will come when they will enter their indignant protest at the ballot box.

The act of November 1, 1893, repealing the purchasing clause of the act of July 14, 1890, declared it—to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coin of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts.

This law was passed by the votes of Democrats and Republicans on this floor and in the other branch of Congress. This is the solemn declaration of policy of the United States on the money question, and it still stands on the statute book. The Republican party now repudiates and abandons that wise policy. The Democratic party will adhere to it. Admitting that "international agreement" has failed and is entirely hopeless, must we give up and sink under the blighting influence of the single gold standard?

It is not true that gold was the "existing standard" when the St. Louis platform was adopted, or at any other time by any authority of law. The act of 1873 discontinued the coinage of legal-tender silver dollars, but the acts of 1878 and 1890, whereby about 500,000,000 silver dollars were coined and made a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, necessarily repealed that act and reestablished the bimetallic system. Really, technically speaking, there never has been any such thing as a money standard of value.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the legal-tender case declared:

It is hardly correct to speak of a standard of value. The Constitution does not speak of it. It contemplates a standard for that which has gravity or extension; but value is an ideal thing. The coinage acts fix the unit as a dollar, but the gold or silver thing we call a dollar is in no sense a standard of a dollar; it is a representative of it. There might never have been a piece of money of the denomination of a dollar. There never was a pound sterling coined until 1815, if we except a few coins struck in the reign of Henry VIII, almost immediately debased, yet it has been the unit of British currency for many generations. It is, then, a mistake to regard the legal-tender acts as either fixing a standard of value or regulating money values.

This is the language of the highest judicial tribunal in the world. The more zealous advocates of the "gold standard" insist that there can be no successful establishment of that standard in our monetary system until the gold unit is regarded precisely the same as the unit of the measure of weight or length. The absurdity of the contention is easily exposed by reference to everyday transactions in business. A pound or a yard is the same in the Klondike country as in the States; but a dollar, whether of gold, silver, or paper, will not purchase one-fourth as much flour or meat in Dawson City as in Washington.

Money has two functions—it constitutes the circulating medium and at the same time acts as a measure of value, or price, rather. No "standard of value" is conceivable independent of the circulating medium. The measure of price or value depends on the quantity of all the money in circulation, not on the quality of any particular portion of it. Greenbacks were necessarily the "standard" until the resumption of specie payments, because gold and silver had disappeared, and because all business was conducted and prices determined by the paper circulation.

When resumption was accomplished, all debts, public or private, were payable in gold or silver, because the word "coin" in the refunding act of July 14, 1870, meant both gold and silver. Until 1873 both gold and silver, in contemplation of law, were the "standards," or, perhaps more accurately speaking, the "standard," and had been since 1792, the date of the first coinage act, although one of the metals had more or less disappeared from circulation from time to time, leaving the other the controlling currency, along with the notes of banks.

The safeguards of our own laws are still left us under this statute of 1893 to establish and maintain the double standard of gold and silver without the "aid or consent" of any foreign nation. When the bill to repeal the purchasing clause of that act was under discussion on this floor, the friends of silver made motion after motion to so amend the law that the ratio might be made to conform, as far as practicable, to the relative commercial value of the two metals, but the Republicans joined hands with the misguided followers of President Cleveland to vote them all down, because the purpose was then, as it is now, to place the country on the single gold basis.

No "safeguards" will be required other than the natural operation of the automatic system of bimetalism at the ratio established by law. The Democratic party believes, as I understand it, that the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 will not drive gold out of the country nor send it to a premium; that it will not impair the public credit or disturb values, but, on the contrary, preserve both, as it always did before silver was stricken down. The act of 1873 was not the only crime against the people, but, supplemented as it was by the surrender by our Secretaries of the Treasury of the option conferred by law to pay public creditors in either gold or silver coin, constituted an essential part in the final culmination of this great wrong.

The Democratic party believes that with both gold and silver as primary money, supplemented, if necessary, by the issue of Government notes, a volume of currency can always be had adequate to the wants of business and necessary to give activity to trade and employment to labor. The Democratic party believes that the adoption of the single gold standard will have one of two effects—either to further contract the currency, cripple industry, and reduce prices, or else, with the banking schemes proposed to be hitched onto gold, will inflate credit money to a degree dangerous to the people by causing suspensions of specie payments and periodical panics. These are fears, if well founded, well calculated to cause hesitation and challenge thoughtful consideration even among those who feel inclined to favor some well-guarded measure of currency reform, in giving their support to the pending bill.

In 1841 Thomas H. Benton, referring to the overthrow of the Bank of the United States, said: "We have driven the tigress to the jungle, but I fear that some day she will return, bringing her whelps with her." The prediction was realized. The "whelps" did return. The country was flooded with "wildcat" banks, carrying suspensions and panics in their course. During the war (1863) came the national-bank system, and now come various schemes to extend, perpetuate, and enlarge their powers. The Democratic party takes its stand against all these measures. They are all obnoxious to the fundamental objection that the Government prerogative and exclusive function of establishing the currency of the people is to be surrendered to private corporations.

The greenbacks are to be withdrawn or impounded and bank notes substituted. An interest-bearing debt is to be created in the place of one bearing no interest and the silver money of the people ultimately destroyed. Approached by many cross paths, winding in and out in bewildering mazes, like the labyrinth of Grecian mythology, which concealed the Minotaur that fed on human flesh, the monster gold standard has its fixed habitation in this proposed measure to do its deadly work in safety.

A Theseus will yet be found to penetrate this modern labyrinth of the artful money power and slay its monster. The Gage bill, the original monetary-commission bill, the Walker bill, and the Fowler bill all proposed a partnership between the Government and the banks, in which the banks were to make all the profits and the Government assume all the responsibility. The pending bill, a compromise of the conflicting views and opposing opinions of the Republican members of this House, necessarily involves some sacrifice of the more radical element of the Republican party of their extreme ideas upon the subject of currency reform, and yet it embraces the basic principle of their contention, viz, the establishment of the "gold standard" and other provisions claimed to be necessary to carry it into effect.

Why all this indirection and circumlocution of detail when the Government can supply all the paper money needed? All did not seem to be lovely in the gold camp at Indianapolis. One of the delegates, a Mr. Cross, a banker, I suppose, and an expert in the mysteries of banking, was thus quoted in the public press while the Indianapolis convention was sitting:

Mr. Cross said there was little chance of the bill ever passing, so the matter would be allowed to rest for the present in its present shape. He said under the plan it would be possible for swindlers to organize a chain of banks, place the stock in irresponsible hands, loot the concerns with straw investments, and leave the honest banks to bear the loss.

The representatives were averse to talking on account of their agreement with the leaders of the movement to maintain silence at this time. The New York delegations organized without recognizing the "Merchants' Association" representatives. Their silence at this time is with the distinct understanding that the bill will never become a law in its present form. Should there be any chance of its becoming a law, the fight will be opened against it. Every effort was made to keep the opposition a secret during the convention.

The great Pitt once declared: "Let the Americans adopt their funding system and go into their banking institutions, and their independence will be a mere phantom." Yet, with all the instructive experience of England and our own as imitators, it is proposed not only to continue a false and disastrous system, but to extend and render it permanent. These "reform" measures, "so called," are perhaps as well guarded as human ingenuity can devise to prevent abuse, but the fatal weakness of credit money can never be cured by human laws. The foundation is fiction, not capital.

The Bank of England is probably as perfect a system as has ever been devised; yet the first year after it opened, in 1696, it suspended specie payments. The catastrophe was repeated thirty-seven times afterwards, ruining the merchants and business in England with panics and bankruptcy. These suspensions disastrously affected the banks of this country by withdrawing our gold and involving our people in the common ruin. It was the greenbacks that saved us in the suspension of 1896, because they were the medium of exchange, and the $45,000,000 of gold that was shipped for the use of the Bank of England did not cause the slightest ripple in the business affairs of this country.

The Bank of England furnishes us another instructive lesson. The bank suspended from 1797 to 1823 by permission of Parliament, and having no gold or silver, or at least only in insufficient quantities, for twenty-five years the bank issued paper currency not made redeemable, nor even made a legal tender. The historian Sir Archibald Alison thus speaks of this period:

The next eighteen years of the war—from 1797 to 1815—were, as all the world knows, the most glorious and, taken as a whole, the most prosperous which Great Britain had ever known. Ushered in by a combination of circumstances the most calamitous, both with reference to external security and internal industry, it terminated in a blaze of glory and a flood of prosperity which have never since the beginning of the world descended upon any nation.

Prosperity, universal and unheard of, pervaded every department of the Empire. Our colonial possessions encircled the earth. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures at home had increased in an unparalleled ratio; the landed proprietors were in affluence; wealth to an unheard of extent had been created among the farmers; the soil, daily increasing in fertility and breadth of cultivation, had become almost adequate to the maintenance of a rapidly increasing population; our exports, imports, and tonnage had more than doubled since the war began; and though distress, especially during 1810 and 1811, had at times been severely experienced among the manufacturing operatives, occasioned by Bonaparte's decrees against British goods, yet upon the whole and in average years their condition was one of extraordinary prosperity.

But this pleasing picture was soon destined to be overcast. England had her "resumption of specie payments," so called, as we have had ours, and the same historian thus describes the results:

The effects of this extraordinary piece of legislation were soon apparent. The industry of the nation was speedily congealed, as a flowing stream is by the severity of an arctic winter. The alarm became as universal and widespread as confidence and activity had recently been. The country bankers, who had advanced largely on the stocks of goods imported, refused to continue their support to their customers, and they were forced to bring their stocks into the market. Prices in consequence fell rapidly; that of cotton in particular sank in three months to half its former level. The Country Bankers' Association was contracted by no less than five millions sterling ($24,000,000), and the entire circulation of England fell from $235,545,000 in 1815 to $174,385,000 in 1820, and in the succeeding year it sank as low as $142,757,000.

The effects of this sudden and prodigious contraction of the currency were soon apparent, and they rendered the next three years a period of ceaseless distress and suffering in the British Islands. The accommodation granted by bankers diminished so much in consequence of the obligation laid upon them to pay in specie, which was not to be got, that the paper under discount at the Bank of England, which in 1810 had been $115,000,000 and in 1815 not less than $103,000,000, sank in 1820 to $23,360,000 and in 1821 to $13,610,000. The effect upon prices was not less immediate or appalling. They declined in general, within six months, to half their former amount and remained at that low level for the next three years. Distress was universal in the latter months of 1819, and that distrust and discouragement were felt in all branches of industry which are at once the forerunner and cause of disaster.

If this truthful writer had been in the United States during the hard process of "resumption" in this country, he would have drawn the picture of ruin and distress in no modified terms. Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson, Thomas H. Benton, and all the original lights of Democracy, are safe to follow. Jefferson said:

Bank paper must be suppressed, and the circulating medium must be restored to the nation, to whom it belongs. It is the only fund on which they can rely for loans; it is the only recourse which can never fail them, and it is an abundant one for every necessary purpose. Treasury bills bottomed on taxes, bearing or not bearing interest, as may be found necessary, thrown into circulation, will take the place of so much gold and silver, which, just when crowded, will find an efflux into other countries, and thus keep the quantum of medium at its salutary level. Let banks continue, if they please, but let them discount for cash alone or for Treasury notes.

Jackson fought the old United States Bank mainly on the ground that Congress had no constitutional power to clothe a corporation with the Government function of issuing paper money.

John Sherman, when he first entered the Senate, and before he took sides with the money power against the people, used this language, in February, 1862:

I much prefer the credit of the United States, based as it is upon all the productions and property of the United States, to the issues of any corporation, however well guaranteed and managed. The only objection to the issue of this paper money [the greenbacks] is that too many may be issued. If, in our Revolutionary war, the amount of the Revolutionary scrip, and in the French Revolution the amount of assignats, had been confined to a small sum in proportion to the wealth of the country—if, for instance, it had been limited to one-tenth of the annual production of the country—there would have been no danger.

The doctrine thus announced by Thomas Jefferson and John Sherman is the doctrine of the Chicago platform of 1896. But the two men are quite different. Jefferson was the friend of the people; Sherman is the associate of the rich and the defender of capital. No man in the United States, if he had followed the principle he announced in the Senate in 1862, could have been of more service to his country. As it was, no man has done more harm. His name is identified with every movement during and since the war to enhance the value of a dollar in the hands of the rich by the stealthy establishment of the gold standard and to bring distress by his contraction schemes to the homes of the poor. He and his associates mutilated and took the life out of the original greenback in the Senate by putting in the "exceptional clause" that the Government notes would not be receivable for interest on the public debt or for customs dues.

Under the disguise of "strengthening the public credit" and "resuming specie payments," he doubled the public debt and made one currency for the people and another for the bondholders. The scathing arraignment of Catiline and Verres by the eloquent Cicero was mild in comparison to what the great Roman orator would have used against our sleek offender if he had been the subject of accusation. Catiline sought only to change the form of a doubtful government, which would probably have flourished as well under one as another. Verres plundered a single province. But men of high positions, trusted officials, and statesmen of reputation and renown during this era of ruthless riot and licentious reign of the money power conspired against the people of a whole nation. Alexander Hamilton went into public life a poor man.

In his funding schemes he could have made millions, as his friends did. He retired to practice his profession, because he could not afford to hold public office. Webster was in the Senate longer than Sherman, and many other public men since his day, and went back to Marshfield poorer than he left it. History will furnish the names of some men since prominent in the annals of legislation who entered public life comparatively penniless and retired with handsome fortunes, if not multimillionaires. People involuntarily remember the opportunities for money getting during the war and since; the position of chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate; the rise in securities as a result of legislation; the "rings" and combines of all kinds that were formed to loot the Treasury and enrich their members.

People will not unjustly conclude that the immense fortune of a public man who comes in poor and goes out rich was never acquired by methods compatible with the responsibility and dignity of a public trust.

Mr. Chairman, the act of July 14, 1890, declared it to be "the established policy of the United States to maintain" the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present "legal ratio (16 to 1) or such ratio as may be provided by law." It is on this provision of the statute that the Republicans rely for the pretense that it is necessary in order to preserve parity that silver dollars should be redeemed by gold dollars or exchanged for gold dollars at the will of the holder.

It furnishes also the pretense for the charge that, as the legal ratio does not express by at least one-half the commercial ratio between gold and silver bullion, it is impossible to have free coinage of silver without putting the Government to vast expense or without accepting silver alone as the standard of value, for the reason that gold and silver would not circulate together at such a wide disparity. The Democratic party contends, on the other hand, that legitimate parity does not mean that silver dollars must be redeemed with gold dollars or that the relative commercial value of the two metals has any necessary connection with the coin or money values of the two metals.

If the contention of the gold people were true, and if 16 to 1 does not express the real commercial ratio, the statute does not limit the coinage at that ratio, but expressly provides that some other ratio may be established by law, so that free coinage need not be abandoned simply because the present legal ratio is not deemed to be the proper one. Under the constitutional power to regulate the value of our coined money the ratio may be changed or the alloy in gold increased and the number of fine grains in silver increased, as was done in the mintage act of 1837, and thus the commercial parity be preserved sufficiently for all practical purposes.

Now, if it is not necessary to pay in gold instead of silver, nor to redeem silver dollars with gold dollars in order to maintain parity, the whole argument against free coinage falls to the ground. Preceding the clause which I have quoted from the act of 1890 is the following language:

That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes (for the purchase of silver bullion) herein provided for the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion.

But so far as these particular notes are concerned, the Secretary has no discretion, because it is further provided in section 3 of the act that after the 1st day of July, 1891, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed—to coin of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of the act of 1890 as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes therein provided for—showing that it was the intention of Congress that this class of notes at least was to be redeemed in silver coin.

To redeem or exchange or swap silver dollars for gold dollars at the option of either the holder or the Government is not parity; it is substitution. Such a process does not preserve parity; it destroys it, because the discrimination against silver makes it less desirable. The discredited dollar is merged in the preferred one, and in reality there is then but one money metal. What gives the silver dollar value is its legal-tender quality and use in a money function. The true way, therefore, to have preserved the parity between gold and silver dollars would have been for the Government to pay out silver instead of gold, kept it in circulation, and given it the widest employment as money, as ex-Secretary Carlisle fully explained it could have been done if the practice had been inaugurated and maintained by the Secretaries after the resumption of specie payments.

Secretary Manning, in Cleveland's first term, was right when he told the New York bankers if they undertook to raid the Treasury to get its gold he would pay them in silver. This was the end of his campaign with Wall street, and gold neither went to a premium nor left the country. If his successors had adopted the same policy, we never would have had any trouble with our finances. If we had gone along with the original policy of Hamilton and Jefferson, paid all public creditors with silver or gold at the option of the Government, we never would have had this agitation on the money question nor heard of the single gold standard.

The panic of 1873 was caused by a greater crime, if possible, than the demonetization of silver. It was brought on by the policy of contraction consequent upon the resumption of specie payment, and to aid in the accomplishment of the scheme to ultimately place the country upon the single gold standard then contemplated by John Sherman and Hugh McCulloch, Secretary of the Treasury, at the instigation of the money power, aided and abetted by the Republican party. On the 1st of July, 1865, the total amount of available currency in the country was estimated at about $1,999,388,995.16, consisting of gold, silver, State bank notes, national bank notes, and Government issues of all kinds.

I here insert a tabulated statement taken from the official records of the Treasury Department showing paper and currency circulation for years 1864, 1865, 1866, and 1867, marked Exhibit A.

For verification of above table see report of the Secretary of the Treasury for years 1865, 1866, and report for 1867 on page iv.

That was a per capita of about $38 for 34,000,000 people. By the policy of contraction as thus inaugurated for monetary stragulation, in order to reach a gold standard, our money circulation was reduced in 1869 to less than $700,000,000, and up to December 1, 1873, the total reduction was $1,230,999,035.

The armies of both North and South had disbanded, and from consumers and destroyers they became producers. The time was propitious for renewal of all branches of industry, but the means were taken away, and the consequence was hard times. On the 1st of January, 1877, 3,000,000 people were out of work. Tramps filled the highways for the first time in our history, and labor strikes and riots with red torch lighted up the country from Pittsburgh to Chicago. The financial ruin and distress were only paralleled by those of England at the close of the Napoleonic wars so graphically described by the historian from whom I have quoted. How plain was the path of duty for Secretary McCulloch.

It was to save the American people all the interest on their debt that could be carried in "legal tenders;" to pay the principal as fast as practicable in gold or silver "coin," according to the terms of contract with the public creditors, and to fund the rest of the debt from time to time, guarding against contraction injurious to business. In the performance of this sacred duty there was glory enough for any human being. But he fell under sinister influences and preferred to retire to Lombard street to share as a banker the fruits of his policy with the sharks and shylocks of the money power.

What was the cause of the panic and hard times of 1893? It was pretended that a doubt had arisen as to the effect upon public credit of our large coinage of silver and that confidence was disappearing. With this view, President Cleveland convened Congress in extraordinary session to repeal the purchasing clause of the act of July 14, 1890. His wishes were obeyed, but the panic continued. The repeal proved no remedy. The fact is, it was a senseless proceeding, based on a false and erroneous conception of the real cause of the trouble. In an interview with the Senate Finance Committee in March, 1879, John Sherman said there would be no danger from free silver if the coinage did not exceed $100,000,000. Beyond that he was quite certain gold would leave the country and financial disturbance would ensue. We coined $500,000,000 under the acts of 1878 and 1890, and no such thing happened.

President Hayes was equally confident when he vetoed the Bland-Allison bill of 1878 that its passage into law would drive all the gold out of the country. Prophecy again failed. Is it not fair to assume, in view of all the false prophecy of the past by Republican seers concerning silver money, that they may be unreliable in the future? The report of the Director of the Mint for 1889 shows that, instead of leaving the country, gold flowed in, the increase from 1878 to 1890 being $592,000,000. There was never any lack of confidence in our financial system until Hayes and Sherman, Harrison and Foster, Cleveland and Carlisle invited gold raids upon the Treasury by announcing the policy officially and privately to the money changers of Wall street and elsewhere that the greenbacks would be redeemed in gold and all public obligations would be discharged in gold.

The panic of 1893 was caused by a hypochondriacal clamor of the money sharks, who set up a howl against the soundness of the currency and the stability of public credit. They locked up their money, contracted credits, and paralyzed the business of the country. They made a rush upon the Treasury for the gold reserve and for the issue of gold bonds. Cleveland yielded and came down with $262,000,000 of gold bonds.

The Republican party applauds his act, and McKinley and the Republican party is ready to repeat it.

Let us briefly notice one of the many important things proposed in this bill. The bill contains eleven sections. In the first section it is proposed to establish permanently the gold standard. Recognizing as we do the power of the dominant majority to write their will and record their arbitrary decree upon the statute books of the nation, it may yet be well to pause and reflect whether—even if the unit of value is to be permanently fixed at 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine—the moment is yet opportune for this nation to crystallize the same into statutory law.

We have recently observed the statement reputed to have been made by the Secretary of the Treasury that he hopes in the near future to be able to refund the interest-bearing obligations of the Government on a 2 per cent basis, and the friends of this measure claim that it will very much facilitate the accomplishment of this much-desired object. This would be an undertaking that would challenge the eager and unhesitating approbation of all, regardless of party division and party differences of opinion upon the merits of this bill, and with this in view our paramount duty is to exercise wise judgment, that nothing may now be done in the way of hasty legislation to embarrass the consummation of this much-desired purpose or make it more difficult of accomplishment.

In a message submitted to this House by President Cleveland during the Fifty-third Congress in which he expressed his determination, in order to meet the exigencies of the situation then confronting the country, to issue $62,000,000 bonds, he said that if Congress would authorize the insertion of the word "gold" instead of "coin" in the bonds the bidders for these securities would give $16,000,000 more for them. In other words, the bond speculators and money magnates of the world placed their own estimate upon the difference in value between a bond payable in "coin" and one payable in "gold."

Congress refused to yield to the demand. Now, you do not suppose, do you, that this difference in valuation was a mere chance guess, or the theoretic deduction of some visionary politician? No, sir; it was the careful and reliable estimate of the most skillful and best-informed financiers of the whole world. By this bill we are now asked not only to violate the solemn terms of written contracts—the written contracts between the people of the United States and the bondholders—but to voluntarily contribute to them, not upon sixty-two millions of bonds alone, as we were asked to do under the Cleveland Administration, but upon the enormous sum of $1,046,000,000, the difference in value between the bonds as they now stand, payable in "coin," and the bonds as they will be under the terms of this bill, if it shall pass, payable in "gold."

The estimate made by the world's best financiers, and has been carefully made and stated upon the floor of this House pending this discussion in the able and eloquent speech of our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN] upon the difference in value of gold and coin bonds of the par value of $62,000,000 was sixteen millions, or about 25.92 per cent, which valuation, if extended to the total issue of interest-bearing bonds now outstanding, would mean an enhancement of value to the holders of such obligations of more than $260,000,000.

This, Mr. Chairman, is but one of the many vicious features of this remarkable measure. And yet our distinguished and eloquent friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] boastfully declares upon this floor that it would be the proudest moment of his life if he could witness the passage of this bill before the holidays and its presentation made to the American people as a Christmas gift.

When the Government came to adopt the first mintage act, in 1792, Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, with the concurrence of Jefferson, Secretary of State, adopted both gold and silver as standard money. They called it a double standard. Three hundred and seventy-one and one-fourth grains of fine silver was one money unit, and 25.8 grains of fine gold was the other.

Hamilton said there were reasons, if but one of the metals should be selected, in favor of gold as the most suitable metal, but that these reasons were overbalanced by the advantage of having both metals, because the selection of one to the exclusion of the other would narrow the money basis and lead to contraction. It is true Hamilton consulted the markets to find the relative value of the two metals when he put the ratio at 15 to 1, but this was more for convenience than for any idea or expectation that the money values of the two metals would always correspond with their bullion or commercial values.

Experience soon showed that was impossible. "Fifteen to one" were words of description rather than of value. The same purpose would have been accomplished if he had provided that the silver dollar and the gold eagle (for there was no gold dollar coined) should be described by some superficial measure as diameter and circumference. Money is the creation of law. When a material is selected for money purposes which has an intrinsic or commercial value as a commodity, it operates under two laws. One regulates its value by legal-tender quality, quantity, and demand; the other determines its commodity value.

To illustrate: Gold was undervalued at the ratio of 15 to 1 and disappeared to a large extent because more valuable for circulation in other countries and for manufacturing purposes. It went to the melting pot or was exported. It is claimed that under free coinage instead of more money we will have less, because about $625,000,000 of gold would disappear. In the same breath we are told that all the silver in the world would come to our mints and make money so plentiful that it would be worthless.

Both objections are ridiculous. Why should gold go out of circulation? Hoarding would be ruinous to the holders, and it would not go to the melting pots for manufacture into plate and ornaments beyond the demand, because that would bring the price down to a losing point. It could not go into foreign circulation without a demand for it, and, if no demand, the gold supply would be overstocked and a decline in purchasing power be sure to follow. Silver would not come in excessive quantities, because that would defeat its own object, and the continued use of it in other countries as currency would make it more profitable than to send it here. All these false specters can be safely left to the operation of economic laws.

In 1834 the ratio was changed to 16 to 1, but this overvalued gold, and silver largely disappeared. It was next tried to preserve both metals in circulation by putting more alloy in the gold coin and more grains of pure silver in the silver coins, 412½ instead of 371½, but this failed to establish absolute commercial equality. And so, in 1853, subsidiary silver coinage was made less valuable as money by limiting its legal tender to $5. But all plans failed, and silver dollars were few in circulation, until finally silver rose to 4 per cent premium, for many years before the act of 1873 was passed.

After the increased alloy in the gold coins double eagles were 6 per cent less valuable than before, but $94 in these eagles paid debts of $100 in eagles contracted before the act of 1873. When the Matthews resolutions of 1878 passed this House and the other branch of Congress the silver dollar was 8 per cent less in metal value than the coin value, and yet Republicans and Democrats voted that it was no breach of faith to pay public creditors in 92-cent dollars. McKinley himself voted to commit this act of repudiation.

Jefferson did not suspend silver coinage in 1806 to destroy silver money like the act of 1873, but to preserve bimetallicism, because his object was to prevent exportation of the silver coins. The act of 1853 was not to abandon the "double standard," but to make silver less valuable as money and bring it back to circulate with gold. Notwithstanding this disparity in commercial value and the temporary disappearance of first one coin then the other, there was always abundance of both metals for money use. Up to 1873 the Government had coined 8,031,238 silver dollars and about $76,734,964.50 of subsidiary coins, and a much larger quantity of gold, which, in proportion to mining resources and facilities and population, was sufficient for all business purposes with the bank notes in circulation.

Political economists of the highest authority discard the theory of the intrinsic value of money. Thus speaks Aristotle:

Money by itself has value only by law and not by nature; so that a change of convention between those who use it is sufficient to deprive it of all its value and power to satisfy all our wants. But with regard to a future exchange (if we want nothing at present), money is, as it were, our security that it may take place when we do want something.

Thus Locke:

Mankind having covenanted to put an imaginary value upon gold and silver by reason of their durability, scarcity, and not being very liable to be counterfeited, have made them, by general consent, the common pledges whereby men are assured, in exchange for them, to receive equally valuable things to those they parted with, for any quantity of those metals; by which means it comes to pass that the intrinsic value regard in those metals, made the common barter, is nothing but the quantity which men give or receive of them, they having, as money, no other value but as pledged to procure what one wants or desires.

Thus John Stuart Mill:

The pounds or shillings which a person receives are a sort of ticket or order which he can present for payment at any shop he pleases, and which entitle him to receive a certain value of any commodity that he makes choice of.

Mr. Chairman, if it is objected that I am advocating "fiat money," I reply that, according to the very best authority, there never was any other kind of money in the world. The greenback is fiat money. The difference between the bullion and coin value of our silver dollar is fiat. It is fiat that makes one of our silver dollars worth two Mexican dollars, though they contain several grains more of pure silver.

In 1763 the British Parliament declared all colonial acts for the issue of paper currency to be void. "Every medium of exchange," said the British Board of Trade, "should have an intrinsic value, which paper has not." Dr. Franklin appeared before the board and completely exploded this nonsense. He said:

However fit a particular thing may be for a particular purpose, whenever that thing is not to be had, or not to be had in sufficient quantity, it becomes necessary to use something else, the fittest thing that can be got in lieu of it. Bank bills and bankers' notes are in daily use here [in London] as a medium of trade, yet they have no intrinsic value, but rest on the credit of those that issued them, as paper bills in the colonies do on the credit of the respective settlements there. Being payable in cash upon sight by the drawers is indeed a circumstance that can not attend the colony bills, their cash being drawn from them by the British trade; but the legal tender being instituted is rather a greater advantage to the possessor, since he need not be at the trouble of going to a particular bank or banker to demand the money.

At this very time—

the silver money in England depends on its legal-tender quality for a part of its value—that part which is the difference between its real weight and its denomination. A great part of the shillings and sixpences now current are, in wearing, become 5, 10, 20, and some of the sixpences even 50 per cent too light. For this difference between the real and nominal you have no intrinsic value; you have not so much as paper; you have nothing.

It is the legal tender, with the knowledge that it can easily be repassed for the same value, that makes threepenny worth of silver pass for sixpence. Gold and silver are not intrinsically of equal value with iron, a metal in itself capable of many more benefits to mankind. Their value rests chiefly in the estimation they happen to be in among the generality of nations, and the credit given to the opinion that the estimation will continue. Otherwise a pound of gold would not be the real equivalent of even a bushel of wheat.

It is said that law can not create value. Law certainly does create the money value of anything adopted for currency, because it can not exist without law. In the legal-tender cases the majority of the Supreme Court of the United States first held (opinion delivered by Chief Justice Chase) that Congress had no constitutional power to pass a legal-tender act by which paper money could be substituted for gold and silver, and that gold and silver were the money of the Constitution, because of their intrinsic value. But on a rehearing of the cases this decision was reversed, the majority holding (opinion by Justice Strong) that the money of a people was a creation of the legislative power.

The court says that Congress can not legislate commercial value into valueless things, but they do say, in effect, that it is competent to use any material as the representative of values. The Constitution does not say in the article about money that Congress can not make something else a legal tender besides gold and silver. This prohibition is addressed to the States. It is not the value of gold and silver as bullion that Congress regulates under the Constitution, which it would be powerless to do, but the value of the money made from it, and the value of foreign coins introduced into the United States.

Roman law did not create sheep and oxen, nor give them their commercial value; but the law did create the money function of the "pecus" (flock), from which we derive our word "pecuniary." It is tiresome to hear this "rot" about "50-cent dollars." As well talk of a "two-dollar" dollar in gold, because with the double standard it is as proper to measure the gold by the silver as to measure the silver by the gold. But in the performance of a money function both are 100-cent dollars, because the unit in one is fixed by law as equivalent to the unit in the other. It is the same yard of cloth whether measured by a tape-line or a wooden yardstick; it is the same bushel of wheat whether the bushel measure is of oak or walnut; it is the same pound of flour whether the scales be constructed of iron or steel; so it is the same price or value whether measured by gold or silver dollars of equal monetary function.

Our present silver dollar contains about 46 cents worth of silver, but it pays as much debt or buys as much goods as any other dollar, not because a gold dollar is under it, which is all fiction, but because the legal-tender quality with the stamp of the Government gives it a money function. The Mexican dollar is only worth with us the amount of silver in it, because it is not legal-tender money in this country, but at home it is a full dollar. Its legal-tender quality can not travel beyond the jurisdiction of the Government that coins it. An Englishman could not pay for a dinner in this city with a "sovereign" except at its exchangeable rate as bullion. There is no such thing as international currency, or "money of the world." We pay for our imports by our exports, and settle balances against us, as do all other nations, by gold or silver bullion as commodities, not as money.

But suppose the fiat theory of money is unsound and that our gold and silver dollars depend on the intrinsic value of the metal contained in them, will the fact of free and unlimited coinage at 16 to 1 with the quality of full legal tender and the free opportunity for use as money restore parity? I think it will. There was practical parity before demonetization of silver, and if the cause of disparity is removed the effect will cease. For four thousand years the ratio between gold and silver was never less than 11 nor more than 16 to 1, until silver was demonetized by the principal powers of the world. The relative amounts of the world's stock of gold and silver has remained about the same through all time and is now about $4,000,000,000 each.

Our stock of gold is about $696,200,542, of silver about $634,509,780. In the United States from 1873 to 1896 there were only two years, 1892 and 1896, when the stock of silver was greater than that of gold, showing that the decline in silver must be due to some other cause than overproduction. What was that cause? Evidently the lessened use of silver as a money metal, because the use in the arts and manufactures has rather increased than diminished the world over.

But it is said that if the restoration of silver as a standard money metal would bring its value up or gold down to the old ratio of 16 to 1 it could not be done without the cooperation of those nations who have united in demonetization. True, not to the same extent, but the tendency would be in that direction, and the vast increase of gold production by the rich discoveries of the Klondike regions, in South Africa, and in the increased output of our own mines by improved methods of production will soon so enlarge our stock of gold as to materially reduce its price compared to silver.

Natural conditions must be trusted to restore the equilibrium. Demonetization did not occur by any international agreement, and no such agreement is required to undo the wrong. France alone by her own policy has kept the two metals at a ratio of 154 to 1 for one hundred years, and she maintains that ratio now with a relative stock of gold and silver about the same as ours. She has not demonetized but only suspended silver coinage since 1876. She maintains parity by paying gold or silver at the option of her great bank, and floats eight hundred millions in paper without any provision whatever for redemption. Her paper is a pure case of fiat money.

France differs from both England and Germany in her money system, and although nominally classed with the gold-standard countries, she is not really so. With the independent action of the United States for the free coinage of silver and gold at about the same ratio as France an impetus would be given to bimetalism that would soon bring the other great commercial powers into line in self-defense. The weakness of the Latin Union—Belgium, Switzerland, Holland, Greece, and Italy—in 1867 to maintain the bimetallic system was in the very attempt at union. Each was differently situated, and when each attempted to control the money affairs of the others the whole thing broke down.

The gold standard was established in Germany in 1871 in the interest of the moneyed classes, but the masses of the people in the Empire had always been used to silver, and would prefer it now if their voice could be heard. Bismarck has said the change from the old order of things was a great mistake and that he had been deceived into its support. India has become restless under the gold standard foisted upon her people by the selfishness of England and is moving towards the restoration of the white metal.

The absorption of our island populations of Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Ladrões, and the Philippines, aggregating more than 10,000,000 souls, is a long step toward bimetalism. For more than two hundred years the Spanish portion of the islands has been accustomed to silver money, and they must of necessity use the silver coinage of the United States in commercial transactions among themselves and with us, now that the Spanish authority has disappeared. Whatever may be the fate of Cuba, her people are most familiar with silver money, though nominally under the gold standard.

Every achievement of American enterprise and industry in developing the rich resources of these islands will compel important additions to the volume of silver currency. Such conditions will go far to establish our silver-mining industry and force up the price of the metal perhaps to commercial parity with gold. Added to this, it must be remembered that we are reaching out, if not for more territorial acquisitions, at least for increased trade with the balance of the West Indies, with the Central and South American States, and with China and Japan, all of which are silver-using countries and will be identified with us in our money policy.

The attempt to establish the gold standard in Russia, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, Chili, and Japan is a complete failure. In each large amounts of bonds have been issued to buy gold, but the experiment has only worked to oppress the people with heavy taxes, contract the currency, and introduce indescribable distress. The reason of the failure is not far to seek. By the necessity of the case exchange is always against poor and indebted countries and in favor of rich creditor nations, which in this way ultimately absorb the wealth of the debtor country. The gold standard is a luxury which none but rich nations like England, dominated by money kings, can afford to have.

The day may not be far distant when England will be crucified on her cross of gold, and the commercial and money centers of the world will be transferred from London and Liverpool to New York and San Francisco. New York now leads London in the amount of annual commerce, while the instructive fact appears that the exports of England are constantly diminishing, while those of the United States are constantly increasing. Truly has it been written that the nations which rule in unrighteousness shall perish from the earth. Who knows but a time will come when the proud mistress of the seas shall realize the picture of Macaulay, when a New Zealander of some future day will sit on a broken arch of London Bridge to contemplate the ruins of St. Paul?

The new policy of colonial expansion, full of difficulties and dangers as it undoubtedly is, may not be without its compensatory advantages. "The stone that was rejected by the builders may become the head of the corner." Both free coinage and free trade are involved in it. The "open door" for the Orient with a Chinese wall for ourselves will never work together. Those "twin relics of barbarism," protection and restrictive navigation laws, which have closed against us the markets of the world and destroyed our merchant marine and carrying trade, will be left behind in the march of events.

The only practicable way to secure international bimetalism is for all the gold-standard countries to act separately and independently. International "agreements" or "arrangements" can never fix commercial ratios. Let two great powers like the United States and France set the successful example of free coinage and bring the two metals to an equilibrium by equalizing coinage value and the others would soon follow. We want neither the gold basis nor the silver basis, neither a cheap dollar nor a dear dollar, but the broad basis of the money of the Constitution established by the fathers.

Let the old greenback that successfully conducted the country through the most gigantic war of modern times, and gave the country such prosperity after its close as it never had, stand as a model paper money. Let the seigniorage of silver now in the Treasury be coined. Let certificates under existing laws issue for the silver dollars coined or to be coined at the option of the holders. Abolish the national bank and substitute Government notes for their currency; pay out to public creditors all kinds of lawful money; open the mints to free coinage without the aid or consent of any foreign nation; and all will be well. And to secure the ultimate accomplishment of this great achievement I hope and trust that this bill will be defeated and thereby prevent the establishment of the gold standard permanently upon the people of this country.

The Democracy of the United States stands as it has always stood upon these questions, and will oppose to its utmost the propositions embraced in this measure. In the name of the six and a half millions of voters who supported William Jennings Bryan in 1896, we will hold our banners aloft, full high advanced, with the inspiring inscription, "By this sign shall ye conquer." The campaign of 1896 was but a skirmish for position; the great struggle will be fought to a finish in 1900. Then again will be unfurled the same colors that went down in honorable defeat in 1896, and our tried and trusted leader, that great advocate of the people's cause, William J. Bryan, will once more challenge to battle the mercenary cohorts of the money power and appeal to the honest yeomanry of his country to rally round the standard of the masses against the classes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would not speak at this late hour were it not for the fact that, you being in the chair, there is a presumption that a quorum of the House is present, and for the further fact that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] in charge of the pending bill is also here, so that I shall assume that I am speaking to the entire body of Republicans of this House.

This bill is not the product of this House or any of its committees, though this Republican House is going to adopt it. A caucus of the Republicans made a committee last winter, who during the summer met at Atlantic City under every influence calculated to induce them to approve the monetary views of the great national banks of the large cities, and prepared this bill. On the meeting of this Congress the Republican caucus decided to pass it without amendment. Its avowed purpose is to place the financial question, so far as the retirement of the greenbacks and the enlargement of the powers and privileges of the national banks are concerned beyond the reach of the next Administration should it be Democratic, as they hope the gold-standard national bank influence will predominate the Senate for the next four years. Fearing our success, they determine to yield to the demand to pay the debt their party owes to themoneyed shysters of Wall street while they have the power. If the people are susceptible to the teachings of great lessons, if they hate extravagance, if they cherish liberty and revere the principles of our Revolution, if they love humanity and humanity's rights, then it is more than probable that they will intrust this Government again in the hands of the Democratic party at the next election. The Republicans in the last thirty years have not carried the country in any two successive Presidential elections. In this bill they attempt to deprive the people of the country of the natural fruits of the next Democratic success.

There is one consolation in this measure to the American people, and that is that the Republican party has thrown off the mask which it has so frequently worn in the last few years upon this great financial question. No longer can they pretend to be the friends of bimetalism. Heretofore when we charged them with hostility to silver, they replied by proclaiming great love for it. Two years ago in this Hall I charged that the Republican party was bound soul and body to the gold standard. The Secretary of the Treasury had already outlined the policy.

The President of the United States, at the rich manufacturers' banquet in New York City, had foreshadowed it, and, notwithstanding all that, there were many Republicans in this country who honestly believed, because they were misled, that there was friendship in the Republican party to silver and to genuine bimetalism. They were misled because the Republican platform of 1888 had denounced "efforts to demonetize silver." The Republican platform of 1892 said that the "American people, from tradition and interest, favored bimetalism." In 1890 Major McKinley, now President of the United States, had spoken strongly and clearly in favor of silver. In this House he had voted for silver. In 1896 the Republican party, in its national platform, had again expressed friendliness to silver. No longer can they pretend it.

The gold standard, and especially the bond-holding interests, have at last induced the Republican party to come out from the entanglements of duplicity and boldly take its position against the best interests of mankind on the great question of bimetalism and the Government's surrender to corporations of its sovereign power to issue paper currency. It has listened to the siren's song and turned deaf ears to the people's needs.

Who is it that has demanded this bill? Who is it that has sent his petition here for its passage? Who was it that met in the Indianapolis convention in its behalf? Who was it that lent the caucus committee his influence? It was not the cotton grower and it was not the laborer that worked in the cotton fields. It was not the tobacco grower nor the laborer that worked in the tobacco fields. It was not the wheat grower nor the laborer who worked in the wheat fields. It was not the blacksmith. It was not the wood workman. It was not the carpenter nor the brick mason. It was not the mill man nor the operatives that work in the mill. None of these demanded it; none of these ask it. It was the trust magnate. It was the great banker, the great bondholder. It was the great national shlylock. His influence was in the last Republican convention. His influence surrounds this bill. He rejoices that he controls the party now in power.

What is this bill? It is a repudiation of the Stanley Matthews resolution. It is a repudiation of the policies of Blaine and Garfield. It is a reversal of a national policy. It is intended to be the final death blow to silver. It is intended to diminish the volume of standard money. The great principle for which we contend is an increase in the volume of standard money. A Republican majority may strike this principle to the ground, but when it touches the people, Antæus-like, it will rise with greater power.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] has said that the Southern members ought to vote for this bill. Mr. Chairman, not only ought not the Southern members to vote for it, but they and the Western members, and all men who love right and justice throughout the country, ought to vote against the bill and in favor of common justice between the creditor and debtor, between the people and the bondholders.

Mr. McKinley, in his letter of acceptance in 1896 of the Presidential nomination, when he was going before the people for votes, used this language:

It—

The Republican party—

has inaugurated no new policy. It will keep in circulation and as good as gold all the silver and paper money now included in the currency of the country.

That is the promise he made to the American people when he was after their support. Here is the demand he sent to Congress in his last message:

In this connection I repeat my former recommendation that a portion of the gold holdings shall be placed in a trust fund from which greenbacks shall be redeemed upon presentation, but when once redeemed shall not thereafter be paid out except for gold.

Then he promised to keep them in circulation; now he demands that they be impounded. If it is to be paid out only for gold, then it is dead as a greenback, for it will be but a gold certificate, and the circulation will be decreased. One can get a gold certificate at any time for his gold. He proposes not only to destroy the greenback, but to do it in such manner as to mislead the unthinking.

Let me call attention to the fact that in regard to the establishing of the gold standard the President in his message made two distinct recommendations, but when considering the trusts, which are drinking the lifeblood of the industry of the country's best people, he has no recommendation, but merely expresses a few indefinite hopes.

The first section of the pending bill declares the gold dollar shall be the standard of value. No longer does the other side attempt to deceive the people with international-agreement propositions. It is now going to, as Secretary Gage said, "commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard." Having in the last Congress given an argument against the gold standard and in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, I have not the time now to repeat it, but I shall endeavor to show that this bill is freighted with disaster and oppression to the great body of the American people. I admit that its first section is practically law now, and is one of the laws against which the great silver forces of the country are at war. This bill is intended to more thoroughly fortify it, but all the battlements that can be raised around it can not protect it against the power of a free people's will when once their understanding is thoroughly informed and that will thoroughly determined against it.

The second section declares that all interest-bearing obligations of the Government, now over $1,000,000,000, and all United States notes and Treasury notes, now about $440,000,000, shall be payable in gold coin. All these are now payable in coin, gold or silver. By their very terms they are so payable. Written in the face of every Government bond it is declared they are "redeemable in coin of the standard value of the United States on July 14, 1870," at which date the silver dollar was a standard coin. This bill further provides that all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established by the bill. Mr. Chairman, a reading of the bonds and then a reading of section 2 by a simple, honest-minded man, unused to the financial world, untrained in Republican politics, would shock his moral sensibilities.

The bond contracts say they are payable in coin, gold or silver. This bill says they shall be payable in gold only. It has heretofore been estimated by gold-standard advocates, I believe, that having the simple word "coin" instead of "gold" in those bonds cost the Government $60,000,000. In other words, that from their sale the Government received that amount less than it would have received if gold had been the payment money. If that be true, it becomes dishonest to afterwards write the word "gold" in those bonds when it cost the people $60,000,000 to leave it out.

If some friend of the people were to suggest that the word "coin" be stricken out of those bonds and in its stead write the word "greenbacks," a shout of indignation would be heard in every money center in all the land. If we were to propose to amend the law so as to make all those bonds payable in greenbacks, charges of dishonesty and anarchy would fill the air between this Capitol and Wall street until we could no longer hear a humble man's petition in the matter. As it would be wrong to change the contract and make them payable in greenbacks, it is wrong to change it to make them payable in gold. No law ought to be passed by Congress that would impair the obligation of a contract. In this respect this bill violates a constitutional principle. Under the Constitution no State can pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract.

Congress should not violate the principle. It is as morally wrong for Congress to impair the obligation of a contract as it is for a State to do so. The Federalist says that laws impairing the obligation of a contract are "contrary to the first principles of the social compact and to every principle of sound legislation." For these reasons I denounce this measure as subversive of the common principles of public integrity, which should be preserved for the interests of taxpayers and to prevent extortion in the interests of bondholders. Lawmakers, Mr. Chairman, should even be more jealous of the rights of the masses, for they require and deserve more protection than the fortunate few.

Mr. Chairman, I hope I am not a pessimist; I hope that I am not inclined to look on the dark side of all matters, but in this age of greed for gold, when so many men of wealth and influence lend themselves to great undertakings whose moral principle is bad, whose effects are injurious to the people, when so many corruptions are charged upon men in high places, and these corruptions so frequently proven to a moral certainty without serious effect upon their standing in the public estimation, I sometimes think that public fidelity and loyalty to the inflexible and eternal right in all things is not of that high character which we attribute to the fathers of our Republic. Representatives, I fear, coming into this gay and magnificent city, listening to the glorious tales of a full Treasury, hearing the shoutings of prosperity, often from trust quarters, are prone to forget not only in what manner the Treasury is filled and from what sources it derives its revenue, but also the struggling man at home in his district who is striving to make an honest living by the sweat of his face. If one can forget that man, then I can easily understand how he can vote for this bill; I can then understand how he can vote to change the country's contract in favor of its creditors and against its people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This bill confers on the Secretary of the Treasury the unusual power to sell bonds when he thinks it necessary to preserve the gold reserve. Such power should not be given to any one man. Congress has the power to borrow money, and its judgment should be exercised upon the necessity of each and every loan. It should not have and in my judgment has no rightful authority to delegate to the Secretary of the Treasury this general and practically unlimited power to sell bonds. It is not necessary to intrust to him the extraordinary power to issue bonds in time of peace, and I enter the protest of as good constituency as exists in this Union against giving him the power to sell bonds to get gold to exchange for silver dollars in order to perpetually imprison those silver dollars.

The power to borrow money conferred by the Constitution was intended to be and should be used only in case of necessity, as, for instance, to carry on a just war or to pay current expenses or other necessary expenses. No good lawyer on the other side will deny this. No man can successfully contend that it is a necessary expense to swap gold for silver dollars. To borrow money for the purpose of killing or retiring the silver dollar is a wrongful use of power. The silver dollar under the Constitution is the equal of the gold dollar, and it is contrary to principle and the interests of the people to load them with debt to get gold to destroy silver.

Although at present it will take more than twice as much of any of the great agricultural products, such as cotton, wheat, and tobacco to pay off one of the Government's $1,000 bonds, as it would have taken in 1873, when the first stab was given to the white metal, yet a great purpose of this bill is to render that bond more valuable, and the result of it will be to make it harder to pay. And, under this bill, as that bond becomes harder to pay, so will all other indebtedness—public and private—become harder to pay. All this is to be done for the benefit of a few wealthy money lenders, and it is done under the name of national honor. The highest honor to which any government can attain is to treat its great masses with absolute fairness and justice. The greatest shame to a government should be placed upon it by every intelligent man of honesty when it deliberately writes into its statutes laws which militate against its masses in the interest of a few, which place heavier burdens upon its poor that it may gratify the demands of the rich.

Section 4 is intended to kill the greenbacks. The United States notes and Treasury notes are to be redeemed in gold and there in the Treasury held securely until someone wants to give the Government gold for them. As I have said, they are practically destroyed, for thereafter they can be used only as a gold certificate, and whether they are in existence or not the Government would give anyone a gold certificate for his gold, just as is now done. So this section in reality gives the death blow to $440,000,000 of paper money and when in the judgment of the Secretary it is necessary gives him the power to sell $440,000,000 of gold bonds, thus changing four hundred and forty millions of money which serves the people well, which facilitates their exchanges, which has built the churches and schoolhouses and homes of this land into an interest-bearing debt, to be paid by us and our posterity. More than that, under this bill the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell gold bonds, if he sees fit to do so and the occasion presents itself, to the additional sum of $190,000,000, and with this money impound the $490,000,000 of silver dollars which have been coined, thus altogether withdrawing from circulation more than $900,000,000 and adding to our public interest-bearing indebtedness that vast sum.

These silver dollars, if the Secretary of the Treasury should see fit, may be transferred to the fiscal department and paid out and give him the opportunity of selling more bonds for gold with which to again redeem them, and thus the "endless chain" will continue to exist under this bill. Not a dollar of silver should ever be redeemed. It is money itself. It needs no redemption. It is an outrage on the rights of the people to treat it as a promise to pay.

But this bill gives the right—no, not right, for nothing can make it right, but gives the power—to retire it. How does that accord with the President's letter of acceptance? Mr. Chairman, my observation has taught me that the Republican party is the only party and its leaders the only leaders who boast of their inconsistencies. It is the juggler who glories in deceiving his spectators, and congratulates himself that his trick is performed in their full view. I venture to say that the political history of the world can not discover another example of a party of equal changes upon great and fundamental questions within a quarter of a century as to-day ornaments the Republican party.

Mr. Chairman, if these vast powers are ever exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury, if these greenbacks and silver dollars are retired from circulation, if this vast increase of the public indebtedness shall be made, ruin and disaster will overtake the farms and factories of this land, and the dread specter of panic will again visit the industries of our people. The dollar, under the increased demand for gold, will go up, and prices will go down, and as hard times touch the great consumers of our country their terrible influence soon affects all who toil and all whose happiness depends upon industry of any kind.

The Republican party hopes to avert the evils to which I have alluded by bestowing greater favors and privileges upon the national banks. I admit that the banks may under this bill, if they see fit, increase their circulation as the greenbacks and silver dollars are retired, and thus in a large measure prevent these evils. But it is supreme folly for the Congress, which ought to hold the interests of the people at heart, to surrender those interests to the mercies of those whose object is to make private profit from money traffic.

The Government should not delegate the sovereign right to issue currency for the benefit of the people to any man or set of men. Whatever paper money the business of the country requires, and it requires more than we now have, should be issued by the Government, and I know of no form of currency better than the existing greenbacks. I would make them full legal tender for all debts and dues. If there is no escape from the national banking system, if we are to forever endure its possession of special privileges, then I see no objection to allowing the banks to issue notes to the par value of the bonds deposited, and I think small towns should have the privilege of having national banks, and I do not think that whether such banks should be established in small towns or not should be left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

But such power as is given in this bill to the national banks has never before been bestowed upon them. It is a dangerous power—the power to expand and contract the currency at will. It is a power such as no monarch has, such as the President himself does not to-day have. How easy it will be for the national banks to form an immense bank trust! Nothing in this bill will prevent it, and the Republicans will not allow an amendment to it to prevent the formation of a gigantic trust to control all banks. How certainly will a few of the larger banks control the entire banking business of the country! Allow the banks, as is the purpose of this bill, to put out and control our paper currency, and they can create a panic at a day's notice.

Let a President be in the chair whom they wish to destroy; let a bill be proposed in Congress which they oppose; let any measure be pending which they desire to force through, and in order to accomplish their purposes they can, under organization and the possibilities afforded by this bill, cause such a panic as the world has never felt. The head man of the banking trust could touch a button and immediately the circulation from the remotest corners of our land would contract, loans would be called in, business would be paralyzed, products would be sacrificed on the altar of debt, and every evil known to the lack of money would curse the people, until they and their representatives should either in supplication yield to the demands of the banks or else their lion nature assert itself in the destruction of their oppressors.

My countrymen of the Republican side, let me appeal to you to grant no such possible powers and privileges to the banks. You may be turning loose upon your country a power that may curse your children and which your older age may regret but may not remedy. Let our Government issue more greenbacks. Let it, and it alone, issue our national paper money. It will not decrease its circulation for profit. It will not hold a terrible power over the people and their representatives to constrain their wills and violate their judgments.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asked what prophecies we made in the last campaign had come true. Mr. Chairman, we predicted that if the Republicans elected McKinley, they would make the bonds payable in gold. This was denied by Republican orators. To-day you are doing it. We predicted that you would retire the greenbacks. This was denied. To-day you are doing it. We admit, however, that it is most difficult to foretell the conduct of a party which changes its position upon great questions so easily. The only means by which we foretold these two things were that we knew from what sources it drew its sustenance.

Throughout this debate Republicans have talked of maintaining the parity of the silver dollar with gold. Mr. Chairman, the standard silver dollar has never been below par, and, further, our paper money, which was full legal tender, never went below par. I refer to the $60,000,000 of greenbacks or United States notes issued in 1862, which were full legal tender for all debts. Our other paper money, which was not legal tender for customs dues and interest on the public debt, did go below par. It is the legal-tender quality of the silver dollar that keeps and will forever keep it to hundred-cents point. Let it retain this legal-tender quality; keep your laws intended to disgrace it from your statute books, and never will it be begging for help in order to remain a hundred-cents dollar. As long as it retains its life as money, unshackled and unpoisoned by Republican policies, just so long will it bear the fearless Goddess of Liberty throughout the land to make homes happy and be at par wherever in all the wide world it goes.

Strike the life out of it by law, and it falls to the earth 50 cents' worth of silver. Place the life back into it by law, and it rises to the hundred-cents value at once. Open the mints of the greatest country the world has ever known, give all silver these great rights to bless mankind, and all silver rises, and then will be fulfilled that purpose set out in the Republican national platform from which the President in his late message quoted—that is, the maintenance of the parity of the values of the two metals, not coins, will be attained. The parity of the two coins has been maintained and will forever be under our existing laws. Under free coinage the parity of the metals will exist.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few words about prosperity, and I am done. In the last Presidential campaign our cry was for more money, and the especial means we advocated was free coinage of silver. Our opponents and our gold-standard friends all said the country had plenty of money. You could not get any gold-standard advocate to admit that the country did not have money enough, and yet now Republican speakers are daily speaking of the increased money in circulation. The gentleman from Iowa says under this Administration our circulation has increased more than $300,000,000, and every Republican says, "Behold the prosperity of the land!"

Yes, the money has increased. The present conditions prove that we were right in demanding more money; and, Mr. Chairman, if our mints during this time had been freely opened to both gold and silver, our prosperity would to-day be unrivaled in all the branches of our industry. Yes, our people are better off, take the country altogether, than they were two, three, or four years ago. The Almighty has blessed this land. Our people, compelled by hard times, have learned to depend more upon themselves and not so much upon the merchant for their supplies. A war authorized by Congress took tens of thousands of men into our Army. It caused the purchase of millions of goods. It caused the expenditure of tens of millions of dollars. It created a $200,000,000 debt on the people, borrowed that money, and placed it again in circulation.

The President's war in the Philippines continues these vast expenditures. A war is prevailing in South Africa between a free people and a European monarchy. That such conditions as I have just recited bring a degree of prosperity for the time being is familiar knowledge. It followed our civil war. As such conditions are not permanent, the prosperity they cause is not permanent. It may be that if the Republican party can have its way in their imperialistic desires, it will see to it that the expenditures shall be sufficient to uphold the prosperity for several years. They have an idea, it seems, that you can tax a people into prosperity. They forget that the people are to-day groaning under war taxes, under the stamp taxes, under the tobacco taxes.

Has it occurred to you that tobacco, a great agricultural product, is taxed probably to twice its value to the farmer? That tax ought to be reduced. It adds 12 cents per pound to the manufactured article. This lessens the demand for it. Reduce the tax greatly and the demand will be stronger for tobacco, and a large mass of our agricultural people will be benefited, and especially will this be true if the power of the American and Continental Tobacco companies to control the trade and prices of so much of that great crop can be destroyed.

Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to think that we are in the course of a long era of prosperity. Nothing can more thoroughly gratify one who loves his country than to know that the toilers of the land, the tillers of the soil, the workmen in the shops, and all artisans and all professional men are happy and prosperous. To know that manufacturers and traders are prosperous and happy and on a sure foundation is a source of happiness to every patriot. With genuine, safe prosperity on an enduring foundation, civilization and progress will go forward.

The humble citizen will educate his children. He will help build his church and schoolhouse. He will, withal, be independent and self-respecting. He will not be dissatisfied. I know, Mr. Chairman, and it is with great pleasure that I am able to say it, that the manufacturing industries of the South are almost universally prosperous. Usually it is a superior class of business men who are in that industry, and they are situated in the most advantageous position in all the world. To prophecy that for many years they will remain prosperous and in a few years control the cotton goods world is not a rash but a pleasant prediction. But let no one think that the farmers of this land are enjoying the same degree of prosperity or that theirs is upon so sure a foundation.

The Republican candidate in the next campaign will find little consolation in the rural districts in proclaiming prosperity in support of this bill. Here are some plain figures, all taken from the monthly summary of Commerce and Finance of the Treasury Department, a copy of which was sent to each member of this House to-day, except the quotations for yesterday's prices, which I take from to-day's paper. Cotton, our great export crop, was selling on the 6th day of November, 1896, the week of McKinley's election, in New York for 8½ cents per pound. Yesterday, December 12, 1897, it was there selling for 7½ cents per pound. In other words, to-day cotton is about one-half cent lower now than it was when McKinley was elected. On November 5, 1896, wheat was selling for 86 cents per bushel.

On March 4, 1897, the day of McKinley's inauguration, wheat was selling for 94 cents per bushel; yesterday wheat was selling for 74 cents per bushel in the same market; so wheat was 20 cents a bushel more when Mr. McKinley became President than it is to-day. In this summary I find no tobacco prices farther back than October, 1898. The average domestic value of our export tobacco for that month was 10 cents per pound. Since then there has been a general decline in price, so that the average price of export tobacco for October, 1899, the last price given, was only 8½ cents per pound, or a decline of 10 per cent in the last year; and, Mr. Chairman, while I have been unable to verify my opinion by departmental statistics, I think that since March 4, 1897, when the Republicans took charge of the Government, tobacco prices have declined so that tobacco is not worth as much to the Carolina and Virginia farmers as it was three years ago.

Each tobacco farmer must be his own judge as to the relative price of tobacco now and in former years. It is universally conceded that the tobacco grown in North Carolina and Virginia does not sell for more than half what it brought ten and fifteen years ago. No doubt much of this decline is due to trusts, of which I shall probably speak hereafter. So much for prices of farmers' products. Let me quote from the same high authority prices at wholesale on some articles for which farmers have to exchange their produce directly or indirectly. Many of these articles are controlled by trusts, which fact, no doubt, in a large measure accounts for the great rise in their prices. Manila, hemp, and jute have under their administration increased more than 100 per cent. Manila was worth 4 cents per pound on March 4, 1897.

On November 27, 1899, the last price given it was worth 14 cents per pound. Since McKinley's inauguration common leather has risen from 20 cents to 25 cents per pound. Rubber has in that time risen from 80 cents to $1.04 per pound. Iron and steel have doubled in price since McKinley's inauguration. Kerosene oil has risen in price from 6½ cents per gallon to 9½ cents. Sugar, on March 4, 1897, was $3.98 per 100 pounds; on November 16, 1899, the last date given in the summary, sugar was $4.82½ per 100 pounds. Tin plate has advanced since McKinley's inauguration from $3.75 to $4.87½. Nails have increased in price in the last twelve months from $1.90 to $2.60.

Such, Mr. Chairman, are some of the prices disclosed by the Treasury statistics. I give them that gentlemen may have their benefit in discussing prosperity. They deserve the careful consideration of the country. But, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to talk so much of prices. I rose for the purpose of giving my reasons in brief for considering this bill a dangerous one. Having done so, I must content myself with voting against it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I can not permit this bill to pass without recording my unequivocal protest against it. There are some things which are clearly evident in regard to this financial question. Prior to the year 1896 no political party ever dared to mention the words "gold standard" in its platform, except to declare against and repudiate that standard. In that year the Republican party declared in favor of it only until international bimetalism could be secured. Since that year the Republican party have advanced on the subject and have now forsaken international bimetalism.

It is strikingly significant that this bill was not brought forward at the last session of Congress and pressed to a passage. And, again, it is worth our while to note that while this bill resembles very much the Gage bill that was before the Banking and Currency Committee, it omits his feature of funding the Treasury notes of 1890, the greenbacks, and the bonded indebtedness of the United States into long-term interest-bearing gold bonds. Why is this omission made? Sir, it is for the purpose of first enacting the gold standard into statutory law to test the temper of the people. Then, if the sentiment of the people be not aroused against it, either at this session or after the next election the Republican party will resort to that same infamous scheme of funding all of the paper money and Government obligations in long-term gold bonds, to last for all futurity as a footing for the national banking system. This bill is the first step, and the funding project will come next. Then the toiling millions, the brawn and muscle of the honest yeomanry, will be chained for years to come as financial serfs to the money oligarchy of the nation.

When the Constitution of 1789 was adopted the framers of that instrument wrote in it that "no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in the payment of debts." By this expression they intended that no State should be permitted to say that anything except gold and silver shall ever be a legal tender in the payment of debts, and, furthermore, that the Federal Government would forever enforce the provision that both gold and silver should be legal tender, and that no public obligation or private contract should or could discredit and demonetize either metal. This constitutional provision was designed to perpetuate both metals as the coined money of the nation. This bill, however, permits, either by public obligation or private contract, the complete elimination of silver as a legal tender. It strikes down the fundamental law in regard to our coinage.

After the first section, defining that the standard shall be gold, the second section says that all obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established—the gold standard. In other words, hereafter all obligations of the Government and all private contracts entered into by individuals shall be performed and paid in the gold coin of the country. It is fair to presume that the framers of the bill meant to make this section retroactive and prospective and to require all debts, public and private, past and future, to be paid in gold. They prohibit a contract to pay in anything but gold. A contract to pay in anything else is intended to be a nullity.

This act will curse the nation and the debt-burdened people more than any measure ever placed in the statutes. I would not be honest with myself if I failed to characterize such legislation in terms in harmony with my feelings and denounce it as oppressive, cruel, infamous! This section will immensely increase the demand for gold and enormously enhance its value. It is estimated that the public and private indebtedness of the United States to-day amounts to about $50,000,000,000. Hereafter it will amount to much more than that and every dollar must be paid in gold coin according to this new statutory standard. We have now only about seven hundred millions of gold in existence in the United States. Hence the strain upon gold will be terrific and cause it to rise continually in value.

Sections 3 and 4 provide for impounding the silver certificates, all the silver dollars, the Treasury notes of 1890, and the greenbacks in the Treasury of the United States, and that they there remain, to be paid out for gold only at the sweet will of some great banker at the head of the Treasury Department. Then gold and national-bank notes will be the only money in circulation, and will be controlled and manipulated by the moneyed ring. All the Government paper money and silver will be locked up in this great public pound to make way for gold and national-bank currency. It contracts the money volume and crushes the people.

Section 4 confers unlimited power upon the Secretary of the Treasury. While the people are denied the right of having unlimited coinage of silver, this official may, under the new law, issue without limit gold bonds and fasten them upon the resources of the country. This act says:

He is hereby authorized to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of said fund, bonds of the United States, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable in gold coin at the option of the United States after one year.

This section empowers the Secretary of the Treasury to issue gold bonds to the extent of $100,000,000, $500,000,000, a billion or two billion dollars, and so on, without let or hindrance, without authority from Congress or any other power in this Government. No such power has ever heretofore been conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury or any other official in the Government. No man in this Republic or in any government should be intrusted with such unbridled power. This immense authority should remain in Congress, to be exercised at the instance of the people, and should not be handed over by them to some official selected by the money trust and bondholders. The act is calling down a curse upon the people, the true repository of sovereignty and all power. The people will feel the effects of this surrender of authority to their eternal detriment and misery.

When we were about to declare war against Spain to free the Cubans I voted for the appropriation of $50,000,000 to be placed in the hands of the President of the United States to inaugurate the war. Every Democrat, I believe, voted for the measure. This, sir, invested the President with a great power and reposed the highest confidence in his integrity. Yet it did not compare in magnitude to the authority here given the Secretary of the Treasury. And when the conflict was waging, when the great naval victory of Santiago was achieved and the Spanish ships were swept from the seas, and Winfield Scott Schley appeared before the world as the real hero of that memorable battle, I was proud that I voted for thus appropriating the $50,000,000! [Loud applause.]

Why is it necessary to give this power to the Secretary of the Treasury? Let us return to the coinage laws as they existed prior to 1873, as the founders of the Republic made them. Let us coin both gold and silver, free and in unlimited quantities, and whenever we issue paper money make it redeemable in both these coins, and it will not be necessary to clothe the Secretary of the Treasury with such high privileges, nor will it be necessary to issue bonds.

Mr. ADAMSON. It will break the chain.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes, and it will break the chain.

With the free coinage of both metals and paper money redeemable in such coins we could have fought the war against Spain without issuing one dollar in gold bonds. The issue is at last clearly presented between those who believe in the gold standard and those who are opposed to it. For the first time in our history Congress has an opportunity of voting squarely upon the proposition, and for my part I feel renewed hope when we go before the people in 1900 on the same incomparable platform and with the same intrepid leader. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The masses now clearly perceive the hypocrisy of the Republican party in declaring in favor of international bimetalism in 1896 and turning their backs upon it in 1899. The plain truth is that in 1866, after the civil war had ended, the banking fraternity of this nation inaugurated a crusade and warfare against the greenbacks and paper money of the Government in favor of giving the banks the privilege of issuing all of the paper money. That war has unceasingly continued since that year, and this bill is the very acme of their highest ambition in that direction.

First, they enormously increased their investments by procuring the passage of the act of 1869 strengthening the public credit of the United States in declaring all Government obligations payable in coin. This more than doubled the value of their investment. Next silver was demonetized in 1873, and the one coin being discredited the other doubled in value by being more in demand. The gold owners and bondholders alone profited by that change in the monetary standard. Then, next, they clamored for the retirement from circulation of all the Government's paper money, and that they be endowed with the supreme function of issuing all the paper money and controlling the currency.

They cared not then, nor do they care now, particularly about gold or silver; they only wish to seize hold of the money-issuing business of the Government and appropriate it to their own control. By this act they secure the imprisonment of the silver and paper money in the newly created division of issue and redemption, and their rights and privileges are greatly amplified and augmented with reference to national banks. Beyond the peradventure of a doubt, this bill clothes the banks and moneyed few with the power of dominating and controlling the money volume of America.

A brief reference to recent political history is here interesting. In 1888, it is said, Mr. McKinley, now the President, wrote this language in the Republican platform:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration for its effort to demonetize silver.

If they were honest then, they are not honest now in their pretension for the gold standard and their enmity to free silver.

Again, in 1892, they declared in favor of gold and silver as standard money, and in 1896 they declared for international bimetalism. And now they have openly abandoned their position upon that question and say to the American people that they did not mean what they said when they promised it. As surely as God reigns, such action will be rebuked by the enlightened consciences of a free people! The American people of all parties are honest and believe in good faith, and when they record their verdict in 1900 it will not be the one expected by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. This will be the first American statute to contain the term gold standard, and it involves more to the masses of the American people than many of you gentlemen think.

You deluded many by the false hope of international bimetalism in 1896. Many voters believed you sincere. It is well understood by the people that from 1792 to 1834 we did have the free coinage of both metals at the ratio of 15 to 1; that from 1834 to 1873 we had the free coinage of both metals at the ratio of 16 to 1, and that when silver was demonetized it was at a premium over gold. These facts the people do know and understand, and when they vote in 1900 they will again manifest their undying friendship for the constitutional money of this country, that served us for nearly a hundred years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A review of bimetalism in this country will disclose the hideous features of this gold-standard measure.

BIMETALLISM.

Money is governed by the law of supply and demand, just as any other commodity. We buy money with commodities in the same sense that we buy commodities with money. When we say cotton is worth so much money, we say money is worth so much cotton. They are equal to each other. Then we know that whatever causes dollars to go up in value must necessarily cause commodities to go down. Hence, whatever causes money to come down in value causes commodities to rise in value. We must ever keep this central idea in our minds, that money is bought and sold just as cotton, wheat, and other commodities.

Inevitably, then, whenever the supply of money in a country is decreased its value is increased. Then commodities measured by this supply of money must decrease in value as the money becomes scarcer. Undoubtedly, then, to increase the supply of money will be to increase the value of commodities, because the value of money is falling. The gold-standard advocates thoroughly understood these truths when they demonetized silver. They destroyed one-half the supply of money and doubled the value of the remaining half by creating a greater demand for the half supply left. Hence they demonetized silver in 1873 to decrease the supply of money and create a double demand for the remaining quantity of money left. The gold money at once went up in value and commodities measured by it went down in value.

John Locke stated the true theory of money when he said:

The value of money in general is the quantity of all the money in the world in proportion to the trade.

And Ricardo said:

The demand for money is regulated entirely by its value, and its value by its quantity.

It is the unanimous opinion of political economists that the quantity of money in the country regulates the prices of commodities. Without understanding this unanswerable and unanswered truth it is idle and vain to undertake to understand the science of money. No man has ever given happier expression to these thoughts than Senator JOHN P. JONES. He says:

There is one principle of monetary science that, if held steadfastly in view, will constitute an unerring guide through what would otherwise be a path of inextricable difficulty. That principle is that the value of the unit of money in any country is determined by the number of units in circulation. In other words, the value of every dollar depends on the number of dollars out. The greater the number of dollars out, other things being equal, the less will be the value of each dollar; the fewer the number out, other things remaining the same, the greater the value of each, and this without any regard whatever to the material of which the dollars are composed. This is the key to the financial situation of the United States. Much more, it is the key to the financial situation in many lands. Without this key it is in vain that the student attempts to unlock the door leading to the arcanum of monetary knowledge. Unlike many of the locks made by men, the lock on that door is unpickable.

Is his proposition true? If so, a dastardly crime indeed was perpetrated against the people in 1873, when silver was demonetized and one-half of the quantity of money in this country was destroyed. It was an infamy to thus send up in value the other half of the quantity of money belonging to the few gold owners and send down the values of the property and products of this country.

Take the statements of the following eminent gentlemen and see with what striking unanimity they vie with each other in proclaiming the eternal truth that the demand for money goes according to its value and its value by its quantity:

To annul the use of either of the metals as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from the comparison of the benefits of a full, with the evils of a scanty, circulation.—Alexander Hamilton, Report on the Mint, 1791.

I concur with you that the unit must stand on both metals.—Thomas Jefferson, Letter to Hamilton, February, 1792.

Wolowski says:

The sum total of the precious metals is reckoned at 50 milliards, one-half gold and one-half silver. If, by a stroke of the pen, they suppress one of these metals in the monetary service, they double the demand for the other metal, to the ruin of all debtors.

Cernuschi says:

The purchasing power of money is in direct proportion to the volume of money existing.

Prof. Francis A. Walker, in his work on Money (page 57), says:

The value of money in any country is determined by the amount existing.

Sir James Graham says:

The value of money is in the inverse ratio of its quantity, the supply of commodities remaining the same.

John Stuart Mill (Political Economy) says:

The value of money, other things being the same, varies inversely as its quantity, every increase of quantity lowering the value and every diminution raising it in a ratio exactly equivalent.

Ricardo (reply to Bosanquet) says:

The value of money in any country is determined by the amount existing. . . .

That commodities would rise or fall in price in proportion to the increase or diminution of money I assume as a fact that is incontrovertible. . . .

The famous gold-standard advocate of England, Lord Overstone, said:

A reduction of circulation must tend to lower prices.—Lord Overstone's Tracts, page 232.

And the distinguished gentleman, Mr. Robert Giffen, who de-claimed against our theory, said:

To say that the quantity of money regulates prices is only the same thing as to say of any article that is bought or sold that its quantity is a material factor in determining its value.—A Chapter on Standard Money, Giffen.

The authorities verifying this quantitative theory come from Aristotle to the present time. During all these years every political economist of any note has announced the theory as being true, and none, living or dead, has refuted it. To-day no Republican of repute denies it. They all boast of the verification of its truth in the recent increased output of gold and say it has made times better.

BIRTH OF BIMETALLISM IN THE UNITED STATES.

The advent of bimetalism in the United States was coeval with the birth of liberty in this Republic. It blessed mankind for nearly a century of our march of freedom and happiness.

Without a long-spun argument, it will suffice to simply state that money arose out of necessity. It was found necessary to find some intermediary to supersede the barter and exchange of commodity for commodity and to serve as a standard or measure of values or prices, if you please, a pricing instrument for the commodities. After the human family had resorted to many things for use as money, it finally fixed upon gold and silver as a natural money. Our Government was formed in 1789, and our written Constitution plainly and unequivocally perpetuates both gold and silver as the money of the American people. True and lofty patriots wrote these words in our Constitution for the benefit of themselves and their posterity to follow. The United States in Congress assembled shall have the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," and "no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

Now, this last clause means that no State, nor the United States, could or should permit anything or any one metal but gold or silver to be legal tender; and it ought to embrace a clear prohibition of gold contracts, and I believe it was so intended and does interdict them. Thus, gold and silver were constitutionally embedded into our theory and system of Government as a measure of values and pricing instruments for all commodities and property. On April 2, 1792, the United States Mint was established by the act of Congress. It gave us a bimetallic money system. It contained these provisions, that we ought to keep constantly in our minds:

SEC. 9. That there shall be from time to time struck and coined at said Mint coins of gold, silver, and copper of the following denominations, descriptions, and values, viz: Dollars or units, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar as the same is now current, and to contain 371 grains and four-sixteenths part of a grain of pure, or 416 grains of standard silver.

This act provided for the coinage of certain other gold and silver coins to be reckoned from this dollar unit.

It placed us upon a bimetallic basis. Section 11 fixed the ratio at 15 of silver to 1 of gold. Section 14 provided:

That it shall be lawful for any person or persons to bring to the said mint gold and silver bullion in order to their being coined; and the bullion so brought shall be there assayed and coined as speedily as may be after the receipt thereof, and that free of expense to the person or persons by whom the same shall have been brought.

This was "free" coinage, and it was "unlimited" coinage of both gold and silver. This is what free and unlimited coinage means.

Section 16 provided:

That all the gold and silver coins which have been struck at, and issued from the said mint, shall be a lawful tender in all payments whatsoever, those of full weight according to the respective values herein before declared and those of less than full weight at values proportional to their respective weights.

This made both gold and silver coins of equal debt-paying power; there was no discrimination against either, and this was true and genuine bimetalism, which we enjoyed until 1873, when the unit of value was changed. The change was as follows, and I put it here in order that we may distinctly and sharply contrast the two laws in regard to the unit of values. Here is the section of the silver demonetization act of 1873:

Sec. 14. The gold coins of the United States shall be a dollar piece, which, at the standard weight of 23.8 grains, shall be the unit of value.

The unit of value adopted by our fathers was changed in a very few simple words. The standard silver dollar by that act was dropped from the coinage laws and the trade dollar substituted with legal-tender qualities limited to $5. And I now propound this query to the Goldite, to anyone, to the enemies of silver. Why was the unit of value changed from silver to gold? It seems to honest thinking men now that it was done to benefit those whom it has benefited, the creditor classes and the gold holders, for they have profited by it and reaped the fruits of the crime. And this is the surest way of locating a criminal—to find the person benefited by the commission of a crime.

Then the legal-tender qualities of the silver dollar were limited to the amount of $5. Here silver was demonetized, and one-half of our money metal was stricken down and made incapable of measuring values, and destroyed as a standard money and money of ultimate redemption. And this bill makes all the paper and silver money redeemable in gold.

FALLING PRICES.

What effect did this act of 1873 have upon silver? My contention is that it placed silver along with other commodities to be measured with the gold standard. It ceased to become a pricing instrument and is priced by the gold unit. It is now a mere representative money and promise to pay. Gold at once began to appreciate in value and to become dearer. From that fatal day there began and continued a deadly fall of prices of all the commodities produced by the laboring classes, including the agriculturists.

Now, since silver has been placed along with other commodities, let us take it together with wheat and cotton and see how these three commodities have fallen. Here are the figures from a book issued by the Treasury Department of the United States called the "Coinage Laws of the United States, 1793 to 1893, with an appendix of statistics relative thereto," and it is to be presumed that this book is correct, coming from Mr. Carlisle's Department.

Depreciations of wheat, cotton, and silver since 1873.

Year.	Wheat.	Cotton.	Silver.
		Cents.
1873	$1.47	19.3	$1.32
1874	1.31	18.8	1.29
1875	1.43	15.4	1.27
1876	1.12	15	1.24
1877	1.24	12.9	1.15
1878	1.17	11.8	1.20
1879	1.34	11.1	1.15
1880	1.07	9.9	1.12
1881	1.23	11.5	1.14
1882	1.11	11.4	1.13
1883	1.19	11.4	1.13
1884	1.13	10.8	1.11
1885	1.07	10.5	1.01
1886	.86	10.6	1.06
1887	.87	9.9	.99
1888	.89	9.5	.97
1889	.85	9.8	.95
1890	.90	9.9	.96
1891	.83	10.1	1.04
1892	.85	10	.90
1893	.80	8.7	.86
1894	.50	7.2	.75

And we all know in 1894, 1896, and 1897 cotton came down to 4 cents per pound. This ought to be convincing that silver, cotton, corn, wheat, and other products have continually fallen in value since 1873; in other words, that gold, the unit of value, has continually risen in value. Now, it will be contended that this fall in values has not been an injury to anyone. Mr. E. Benjamin Andrews, president of Brown University, a member of the International Monetary Conference at Brussels in 1892, and a great international bimetalist, says:

The decline in prices now going on in itself marks no advance in civilization. One may, indeed, speak of a fall in prices as a sign of economic advance, while under the world's present economic system it often is, but never as itself an element in such advance, for this it is not. That many manufactured articles have long been decreasing in intrinsic cost is a great blessing, and articles of this class would doubtless have gone down more or less under an ideal system of money. But it was not necessary that general prices should fall; and this fall, I maintain, has been an absolute and unmitigated curse to human civilization. Mark, it is not low prices which I condemn; low prices once established are as desirable as high. That is to say, the words "high" and "low" in respect to prices are not absolute but relative terms.

The continual fall of prices, the act of sinking, is the accursed thing. None profit from it but such as are annuitants without being producers; and we may be sure that no civilized state is going to legislate to keep prices falling when it is once seen, as it must soon be seen, that the fall injures all but the very few unproductive people who live upon their incomes. Bankers and money lenders, as such, are not interested to have prices fall and the value of money increase. What enriches bankers is lively business, plentiful trade, demand for capital, high interest—phenomena which never accompany appreciating money, and in the nature of the case can not do so.

This is from a great authority, and a thorough study by any person conscientiously seeking the truth will be convinced of the absolute verity of Professor Andrews' remarks. The fact is that it is only the creditor classes, the money lenders, the persons with fixed income, and the annuitants that are benefited by falling prices and the rise in the value of money.

All other classes are injured. Let us take the farmer, for instance. There are certain fixed charges that have never been reduced for him. Taxes are the same, railroad freights, salaries, pensions, schooling for his children, and interest for borrowed money are the same. He does not get the benefit of falling prices, for he sells at reduced prices and pays about the same fixed charges he always paid. This class constitutes over 45 per cent of our population, and if the agriculturalist happens to be in debt, owing a balance on his farm, as many do, he is only plunged in deeper woe by the falling prices of his products, and yet he must pay the same upon his debts and fixed charges.

STANDARD OR MEASURE OF VALUES; WHAT IS IT?

With this we pass on to another phase of the question. It is contended by the gold-standard advocates that we can not have a double standard. That we must either have a single gold standard of values or a single silver standard of values. The greatest writers upon the question of money now concur in this fundamental principle: the value of money in a country, other things being equal, varies inversely as its quantity, every increase of quantity lowering the value and every diminution raising it in a ratio exactly equivalent.

Therefore it follows beyond dispute that if the act of 1873 demonetized silver, destroyed it as a standard or measure of values, the other half of our metallic money, being gold, was doubled in value. Property would be worth just half what it was before. Now, suppose you restore silver to its rightful position that it occupied before 1873, you double the value of all property by making silver real money, and doubling the quantity of our real money puts us back upon a genuine bimetallic basis and not upon a so-called double standard.

It is the quantity of real legal-tender debt-paying money that determines the values of property, and not the "two-yard sticks" theory so flippantly asserted. All real thinkers upon this point have arrived at this conclusion. Accordingly, so long as we are upon a gold unit of value, the prices of property and commodities must continue to fall and remain low. Restore silver to its position as standard money, and prices will rise, industries will be stimulated, factories will hum, labor will be justly rewarded, and a great era of new prosperity will dawn upon us.

ANOTHER DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE—AMERICAN BIMETALLISM.

The United States is able to maintain her own independent bimetallic system without leaning upon any other country. In the first place it is admitted that we are the greatest silver-producing country in the world. I will argue this question of the ability of the United States to maintain bimetalism from three standpoints: First, that there is no danger of a silver deluge; second, that 96 per cent of our commerce is domestic and we should legislate in favor of our home industries and commerce, and third, that there is no prospect of any international agreement or international bimetalism. It is estimated that the silver and gold money today of the world amounts to about $8,000,000,000, of this amount $4,000,000,000 being in silver and $4,000,000,000 being in gold.

Now, this is the metallic money of the world. In the United States only gold is redemption money, the other money being merely credit money redeemable in gold—simply a promise to pay in gold. Now, in the United States we have in all kinds of money, gold, silver, and paper, about $1,800,000,000. One-third of this is silver money, to wit, $600,000,000. This money, by the act of 1873, ceased to be the unit of values and passed to the stage of credit money, or representative money. Many say they would be willing to join with us in the free coinage of silver if they were not afraid that we would be made the "dumping ground" for the silver of the world—that they are afraid of the silver deluge. A great many honest men believe this to be a real and good objection.

Mr. Mulhall, the English statistician, views the matter in this way in regard to the relative production of gold and silver: In 1848 there were 31 tons of silver to 1 ton of gold in the world. In 1880 there were 18 tons of silver to 1 ton of gold, and in 1890, 18 tons of silver to 1 ton of gold. Now, you see, from 1848 to 1880 the relative supply of silver decreased, and from 1880 to 1890 it just about held its own. Since this time there have been no newly discovered mines from which this deluge of silver is to come, and the old ones have been worked until it is now unprofitable to work most of them.

Think what relation the increase of money bears to the increase of population—business industries and enterprises calling for an augmented volume of money! The statement of the proposition makes an unanswerable argument. Where is this increase of silver coming from? The gold-standard advocates are challenged to state where. It is admitted by all thinking and investigating men that there is not for sale in the world to-day enough silver bullion to create an overproduction of money in the United States. Examine carefully the figures and you will convince yourself that this argument about a silver deluge is only an assertion, and that there is no possibility of too much money coming into circulation in proportion to the increase in population and business.

John G. Carlisle—the Carlisle that used to be a friend of the people—when he was honestly seeking to represent his people and made earnest investigation for their benefit, said:

I know that the world's stock of precious metals is none too large, and I see no reason to apprehend that it will ever be so. Mankind will be fortunate indeed if the annual production of gold and silver coin shall keep pace with the annual increase of population and industry. According to my views of the subject, the conspiracy which seems to have been formed here and in Europe to destroy, by legislation and otherwise, from three-sevenths to one-half the metallic money of the world is the most gigantic crime of this or any other age. The consummation of such a scheme would ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilences, and famines that ever occurred in the history of the world.

The absolute and instantaneous destruction of half the entire movable property of the world, including houses, ships, railroads, and other appliances for carrying on commerce, while it would be felt more sensibly at the moment, would not produce anything like the prolonged distress and disorganization of society that must inevitably result from the permanent annihilation of one-half the metallic money of the world.

These utterances were made in 1873 in the halls of Congress, before Mr. Carlisle felt the blighting touch of Wall street, the Rothschilds, the Morgan syndicates, and the coupon clippers. Has that deluge of silver come? Call on Mr. Carlisle's report again. Here are the figures from his Department:

According to the revised figures the world's production of gold and silver for the last three years has been as follows:

Year.	Gold.	Silver.
1890.....	$113,149,000	$172,234,500
1891.....	120,518,800	186,755,000
1892.....	130,816,600	196,605,300

These figures show that up to the time of the repeal of the Sherman law there was no overproduction of either gold or silver and that the annual entire output of the money of the world would just a little more than pay our yearly pension roll of $150,000,000. These figures ought to convince any person honestly seeking information that there is no danger of getting too much silver in circulation. The foreign nations would not bring the silver here to be coined, because their ratio is 15 to 1. They would not lose the difference in the ratio and then pay shipping charges, insurance, and other expenses, for this would not profit them one particle. Hence the mere statement of these facts carries an abundant argument with it.

The fact is that the sum total of the amount of gold and silver that could be added each year to the world's metal money can not much exceed $200,000,000. It is only a little more than 2 or 2½ per cent of the present volume of silver and gold. This annual increase, added to the total amount of money in the world, is not adequate for commercial needs and business enterprises. History does not record a country in all time that had too much metallic money.

AMERICAN CURRENCY FOR AMERICAN COMMERCE.

It is estimated and can not be disputed that 96 per cent of our commerce is domestic commerce, and only 4 per cent is with foreign nations and 2 per cent of that is with silver-using countries. Let us relieve the distress at home by enlarging our money volume and putting new life into our home commerce. Official reports show that our commerce with foreign nations amounts to about $1,714,000,116, and our domestic commerce amounts to something over $110,000,000,000. We have transactions at home that amount to more than fifty times the transactions we have abroad.

New enterprises are springing up, corporations are making large investments, railroads are making vast extensions and building new lines, commercial schemes are in operation all around us, and they all demand more money—money at home. I say do not impoverish our domestic commerce, but take the shackles off and give us an increased supply of money. We need it here, and we ought to stand by our own homes and firesides first. Give us all the money of our mines as standard money, and we have a place for it. We can use it. We are large enough, grand enough, and progressive enough to absorb it.

In his balance sheet of the world Mr. Mulhall, the statistician of the Royal Society of England, says:

It would be impossible to find a parallel to the progress of the United States in the last ten years. Every day the sun rises upon the American people it sees an addition of $2,500,000 to the accumulation of wealth in the Republic, which is equal to one-third of the daily accumulation of all mankind outside of the United States.

Thus one-third of the world in daily productive power is here represented, and will it be argued that such a power can not sustain its ancient, its much-needed money?

We produce more than two-fifths of the silver of the world and we can use it as redemption money.

We should not wait for England or any other country to join with us in going to bimetalism. The European countries are not ready to join us. England never will. She is a creditor nation. There the bondholders and coupon clippers live, and they have the mother country by the throat. There the Rothschilds live, and they own one-half of the gold of the world. They want to make their gold go up in value and not go down.

They well know that scarcity of gold appreciates its value. We owe England. She wants to depreciate the value of our silver and agricultural products, and knows, since they are measured by gold, she can do so by retaining the single gold standard, and make her gold coming from her Australian gold mines go on rising in value, and measure our products by this enhancing standard. She well knows that so long as her standard of values is measuring our products and still rising the prices of our products are declining, and she is getting our silver, cotton, wheat, rye, barley, and other products for smaller and smaller prices, and Shylock continues to fatten. Then why should she take the initiative when it is profit and all profit to her constantly?

If we but announce to the civilized world that we propose to coin all the gold and silver obtainable alike and make them primary money, the other nations, knowing our capacity to produce gold and silver, will join hands with us. It is estimated that England harvests from us annually as interest on bonds, mortgages, and other securities the sum of $200,000,000 in gold. Three years would take all the gold we use as money in America, for we only have $600,000,000. Then where is the money to circulate at home and pay off private debts and carry on our own transactions? It is understood that England alone holds more than $5,000,000,000 of our railroad bonds, municipal bonds, and other securities. The interest is payable in gold. This bill makes the principal and interest of all obligations payable in gold.

INTERNATIONAL BIMETALLISM.

The delusive hope of international bimetalism has vanished, and no sane man any longer holds out this false promise. Mr. McKinley's bimetallic European exploiters have returned bearing no fruit. The Aunt Nancy party, conceived and brought forth at Indianapolis, announce, through their monetary commission's report, that the prospects for international bimetalism have faded away like a dream. The Secretary of the Treasury and his avaricious cohorts say that we must be chained to the gold standard as a purely American policy.

In 1893 there was a monetary conference in Brussels, Belgium, and England there boldly and candidly, through her delegates, stated her position upon monetary units and standards. She demonstrated clearly that she had no idea of abandoning the gold standard, and it seems to me that this ought to be an indisputable and everlasting answer to those who hope for international bimetalism. Here is her answer, and it satisfies me that England is eternally set upon the gold standard under present conditions. I take this from the Report of the International Monetary Conference, held at Brussels, page 113. Sir Rivers Wilson, delegate from England, said:

In order to avoid all misunderstanding, I desire, on behalf of Sir Charles Freeman and myself, to make in the face of this assembly our profession of faith. Our faith is that of the school of monometallism pure and simple. We do not admit that any other than the single gold standard would be applicable to our country.

Do you want any further answer from England? But this bill repudiates international bimetalism; hence that question is eliminated.

When I say that I favor returning to our monetary system that existed prior to 1873, I mean that we ought not to make one metal dollar redeemable in another metal dollar. The dollar ought to be the redeemer, not the redeemed. Both gold and silver dollars ought to be made by our laws redeemers, and then they will be treated alike. This is bimetalism. The true essentials of bimetalism are these: A legally fixed ratio between the two metals; impartial coinage at that ratio.

They should be legal tender for all debts. They should be collected and paid out alike. And both should be used as standards and redemption money.

16 TO 1 SHOULD BE THE RATIO.

I favor the ratio of 16 to 1 because it is our present legal ratio, and it would be a great expense to change the ratio, and the amount of pure silver in the silver dollar has never been changed since 1792. I believe in keeping the gold and silver dollars at a parity, and I believe 16 to 1 will do it. It did exist on a parity at that ratio for 200 years, according to the very best statistical authorities. Take the shackles off silver and it will come up to an even value with gold according to our ratio. Our Treasury Department has published the figures showing that gold and silver were at a parity at the ratio of 16 to 1 up until 1873, when silver received the fatal blow. It then went down under the operation of a cruel law, and not because it was an inferior money.

If bimetalism succeeded this way for nearly a hundred years, I am willing to try it again. If the ratio does not prove correct, it will then be time enough to try something else. Until the goldites unfold the ratio they propose, which they have never yet done, I shall stay by the old time-tried ratio. We do not contend that the law can absolutely fix the values of gold and silver, but we contend that it can liberate certain economic forces which will make gold and silver regulate their values at about the ratio of 16 to 1.

We recognize the law of supply and demand. A child can understand that if Congress passed a law saying that no hogs should be killed for food, nor eaten by any person in the United States, the price of pork would go down and the price of beef and mutton would go up. So with silver. The law depressed its value by saying it should not be used as money, and gold went up. Suppose the law should decree that it should be no longer legal to use gold as money or to use it in the arts. Do you not know it would go down in value?

We had the free coinage of gold and silver from 1816 (when England went to the gold standard) until 1873, and the two metals were at a parity at our legal ratio. We did not need England then, and we do not need her help now. Again, for seventy years France walked alone with her bimetallic standard and maintained the ratio of gold and silver at 15½ to 1, and even drew our gold from us, and did not need the help of England. How did France with her financial environments compare with the mighty resources and energies of our country in its grandeur? Double our money volume and fix our own ratio, and gold and silver will counterbalance and regulate each other, and the argument of experience demonstrates it.

It can not be denied truthfully that silver has been ill treated by many nations and gold has been fostered and legislated in favor of. The gold and silver bimetalism that Sir Isaac Newton recommended for England was destroyed in 1816, and Lord Liverpool succeeded in placing England upon the gold basis. The bimetalism that France enjoyed and that Napoleon favored has been destroyed, and in 1874 France went upon the gold standard. In 1873 Germany planted herself upon the gold standard, and in 1873 the Latin Union, along with France, adopted the gold standard. In 1873 the Democratic bimetalism that existed in the United States, the true bimetalism of Jefferson, Hamilton, and Jackson, was crushed out and our country laid prostrate at the feet of gold-standard England.

Now, India, with her millions of population, has wiped out silver coinage. The demand for gold has become immense, while the rejection of silver as money has gone in another direction in a corresponding degree. So that since these demonetization acts more than 500,000,000 people are fighting for and demanding gold for their standard of values when the supply of gold for monetary purposes is trifling. This we know—that since these acts of 1873 legislating against silver we have had panics, distress, strikes, falling prices, and misery all over the globe. They have not been confined to our own country, but have been felt in England and throughout the civilized world.

What people have these acts benefited? None, save only the moneyed few, the bondholders, and money lenders. We do know that since about 1873 we have had evil days everywhere. Here is a studied report of a royal commission created by England in 1885. This ought to be read and pondered over by every patriotic citizen in this country. It will change the minds of some honest men. The commission reported:

1. That the depression dated from the year 1873, or thereabouts.
2. That it extended to every branch of industry, including agriculture, manufactures, and mining, and that it was not confined to England, but had been experienced in a greater or less degree in all the industrial countries of the world.
3. That no adequate cause for this state of things was discoverable, unless it could be found in some general dislocation of values caused by currency changes and which would be capable of affecting an area equal to that which the depression of trade covered.

The panic has come, and it has come to stay until bimetalism is restored.

SILVER WILL NOT DRIVE OUT GOLD.

It is urged that to restore silver to the position of redemption money would drive gold out of circulation. This same prediction was made when the Bland-Allison Act was pending, and the gold-standard advocates said that it would drive all of the gold out of the country, but the official reports show that immediately upon the passage of that act our gold stock went up from $230,000,000 to $700,000,000. These are facts and can not be denied, and yet the gold men tell you and expect you to believe that the rehabilitation of silver will drive gold out of the country. What if it did? Would not we have a good volume of silver money, and would not other money come to take the place of the gold? And if gold does leave the country when we restore silver to its proper functions is that a sound argument against raising the prices of our products by remonetizing silver? Sir, we this day have a gold panic in this country and we are now on the gold standard.

The estimated wheat crop of the world for the year 1891 was 2,432,000,000 bushels; for 1892 it was 2,403,000,000 bushels; for the year 1893 it was 1,904,000,000 bushels. With a reduced crop for 1893 the Liverpool price has gone down from $1.15 per bushel in 1891 to 77 cents a bushel in 1893. In the United States the wheat crop in the year 1892 was 516,000,000 bushels, and for 1893, 396,000,000 bushels. In 1892 the cotton crop of this country was 6,717,000 bales, and for 1893 it was 6,600,000 bales. The price went down from 8.4 cents a pound in 1892 to 6.89 cents per pound in 1893, and we all know that in 1894 it went down as low as 4 cents a pound. Prices in cotton, wheat, and other farm products have steadily declined in value since 1873. Ought this decline to be stopped, and can it be done?

The fall in prices began in 1873, when our standard was reduced by striking off one-half the quantity of our standard—striking off the silver half—reducing the dimension of the standard that priced our commodities. Then, if this be so, restore that standard to its normal proportions and you restore prices to their normal conditions. The scramble for gold has made it go up in value, and we have to pay more of our products for it. John Locke said years ago:

The greater scarcity of money enhances its price and increases the scramble, there being nothing that does supply the want of it. The lessening of its quantity always increases its price and makes an equal portion of it exchange for a greater of any other thing.

Then, if this be true, coin gold and silver just alike; make one metal just as good as another; make no law apply to one that does not apply to the other; make both redemption money, and coin them at a proper ratio in our country, and prices of agricultural products will rise, trade will be restored, and we will once again feel the life of a new era in all our business transactions.

OUR LOSSES SINCE 1873.

The demonetization of silver when it was at a premium of 3 cents over gold lost annually the producer on cotton and wheat $155,550,000, while the mine owner lost only $13,000,000 annually. Carefully analyze the following statement:

LOSSES CAUSED BY THE DEMONETIZATION OF SILVER, 1873 TO 1893.

Loss to silver producers, $198,617,908.
Loss to wheat producers, $3,900,542,002, or $19,638 for every $1,000 lost by silver producers.
Loss to corn producers, $9,441,525,243, or $47,536 for every $1,000 lost by silver producers.
Loss to cotton producers, $4,810,210,344, or $24,218 to every $1,000 lost by silver producers.

Or for every $1,000 to the silver producers caused by the demonetization of silver, the wheat, corn, and cotton producers lose $91,322, to say nothing of the wool and pig-iron producers and all the other labor products of the country.

The average population of the United States for the period from 1872 to 1893 was 50,000,000. The loss during that time, caused by the demonetization of silver, upon the three great staple products of the country—corn, cotton, and wheat—amounted to $18,152,278,189, or a loss per capita of $363; so it is safe to assume that the loss to all industries has been at least $1,000 per capita.

It is not a question of benefiting a mine owner. It is a question of reinvesting one of the elements of nature's God with its ancient money function and restoring the prices upon our drooping and depressed products. It is a question of liberating silver as a pricing instrument from the tyrannical heel of gold as a robbing standard. Yes, all the metallic money in the world does not exceed $8,000,000,000, and to raise the amount of our primary money $4,000,000,000 would enhance the value of our property many billions of dollars by simply doubling the value thereof, while the profit to all the miners in the world would hardly be noticeable compared to this immense increase in the value of our property and commodities.

Think of the proposition and take it home with you. We must do something to relieve this distress. The 35,000,000 people we have engaged in agricultural pursuits (the prices of their products continually falling) will have nothing to purchase the products, wares, and merchandise of those persons engaged in other pursuits, and the factories will have to stop and many industries call a halt. The farming class must get something for its products to buy from the other classes, for if the agriculturist can not buy the other classes can not sell to many others, and business must be paralyzed. Then the wages of all the laboring classes must fall and in many instances cease altogether.

Falling prices must be arrested or ruin is close at hand for millions of people. But bimetalism is coming; the people are aroused and will resurrect the silver of their fathers. The young men of this country will live to see our Republic again blossom as the rose under true bimetalism.

The Democrats have always favored the coinage of gold and silver as the standard legal-tender money of the country, and in the fullness of time the patriotic hearts and minds of the American freemen will revivify the coinage laws of the builders of our Republic that blessed mankind for nearly a century. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's pro-ceedings; when, on motion of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous con-sent, the further reading was dispensed with.

Memorial to Congress No. 1 A.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America assembled:

Whereas our American merchant marine during the past forty years has so declined that at the present time less than 10 per cent of our exports are carried abroad under our own flag instead of 90 per cent being so carried, as was the fact at the beginning of this period; and

Whereas our iron and steel industries have reached such a stage of development that we can now furnish the raw material for shipbuilding at as low a cost as any nation; and

Whereas the State of Wisconsin is dependent upon foreign markets for the disposition of its surplus grain, stock, and dairy products: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That, for the benefit of our farmers, miners, and manufacturers, and for the prosperity of our whole State, as well as the nation, we hereby petition Congress, now in Washington assembled, to speedily enact such laws as will give American shipbuilders and American steamship owners such encouragement as to cause them to build and maintain such a merchant marine as will successfully compete with all foreign nations for the carrying trade on the high seas and be an honor to our nation.

Resolved, That the governor is requested immediately to transmit a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to our Wisconsin Senators and Representatives in Congress.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted on the 12th instant by Mr. PETTIGREW, as follows:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the flag of the Philippine republic was carried by vessels in the bay of Manila, and whether the flag of the Philippine republic was ever saluted by Admiral Dewey or any of the vessels of his fleet at any time since May 1, 1898. Were Spanish prisoners delivered over to the Philippine forces at the time of the surrender of Subig Bay? Did a vessel commanded by the forces under Aguinaldo, flying the Philippine flag, accompany the vessels Concord and Raleigh back to Subig Bay in June, 1898, in order to compel the surrender of the Spanish forces?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable without consent.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not desire to debate the resolution, but I do desire to make a brief statement of two or three minutes with regard to it. I hope, therefore, the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw his motion for that purpose.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I may be allowed to say that I dislike to do so. Debate upon this resolution will do harm, in my judgment, to the interests of the country, and—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable without consent.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement of the reasons for introducing the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to submit some remarks on the resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, this is a resolution simply of inquiry, and relates to facts which very many people are desirous of ascertaining.

Mr. SPOONER. Alleged facts.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Alleged facts, the Senator from Wisconsin says. The resolution relates to alleged facts with regard to which people are desirous of securing information. It has been asserted, and I have never seen it disputed, that vessels bearing the flag of the Philippine republic passed in and out of Manila Bay during the summer of 1898; that those vessels were saluted by the vessels of our fleet; that at one time the insurgents, the forces of Aguinaldo, the forces of the republic of the Philippines, attacked the Spanish forces at Subig Bay, about 50 miles from Manila; that one of the small vessels belonging to the Philippine republic returned to Manila for assistance; that this vessel came back, accompanied by two vessels of our fleet, flying the flag of the Philippine republic, and the surrender of the Spanish garrison was secured; and that the officers of our fleet turned the prisoners thus taken over to the Philippine insurgents.

Now, these are facts of great interest, if they are facts, to many of the people of this country. I have been requested by several very prominent people of the United States to ascertain by inquiry, if possible, the truth of those newspaper statements, and I therefore introduced the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, every word of the resolution and every word of the speech of the Senator will be telegraphed to Manila and do mischief to the Government.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire that the resolution shall lie on the table.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I call for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I do not see that Senator in his seat, and I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER (when Mr. QUARLES'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. QUARLES] is absent from the Chamber for the moment. He has a standing pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PROCTOR. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I inquire if he has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. CULLOM. I therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 14, 1899.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. MCALEER, a Representative-elect from the State of Pennsylvania, appeared at the bar of the House and was sworn in by the Speaker.

MONTHLY ACCOUNTS OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration and passage of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to extend the time for examination of monthly accounts by bureaus and offices of the War Department.

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for examination of monthly accounts by the bureaus and offices of the War Department after the date of actual receipt and before transmitting the same to the Auditor for the War Department, as limited by section 12 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved July 31, 1894, is hereby extended from twenty days to sixty days for the period of one year from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. HULL. One word in explanation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman can show that there is an immediate necessity for the passage of this bill. It modifies existing law, it has been to no committee, and has not been considered in the usual way, and unless there is a pressing emergency for the bill I do not think it ought to pass.

Mr. HULL. Unless there was a pressing emergency, there would be no excuse for offering it. I have copies of the letters from the Secretary of War and officers of bureaus asking for the immediate passage of the bill. The original letters were sent to the Speaker and from there were sent to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed, and from that committee to the printer, so that the originals are not in my possession. The proposition is to reenact the law that was enacted on the 5th of last January, which extended the time for passing these accounts. The law expires on the 5th day of next January. We shall adjourn to meet on the 3d of January, and unless the act is passed the effect will be this: the accounts coming in from Manila, from Puerto Rico, and from Cuba and all parts of the Government where the Army is stationed will be tied up; and while it does not suspend the officer, it does prevent his transacting any further business until his accounts are passed.

So if we do not pass this bill the paymasters, the quartermasters, the commissaries, and all their bureaus will be held up until the accounts for the current month are passed. The Auditor for the War Department has notified the War Department that he will insist on a strict compliance with the twenty-day law. So unless we pass this bill it will be impossible for the paymaster to pay a regiment; it will be impossible for the commissary to furnish food; it will be impossible for the paymaster to furnish a tent or supplies of any kind until his accounts for that current month are passed. They could not even put on a large force of clerks to do it because they would be raw men.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was about to ask if this bill made any increase in the amount that will be paid.

Mr. HULL. Not at all. By passing it it leaves the force just as it is. By not passing it, if they could utilize more clerks, it might be possible to get through in the twenty days.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the gentleman from Iowa to say that he had conferred with the members of the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs in the last House, and that there was no objection on their part.

Mr. HULL. I did. I could not find the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox], but I conferred with the gentlemen from New York, from Ohio, and from Illinois.

Mr. JETT. The gentleman from Iowa called my attention to it yesterday morning, and from my standpoint I can see no objection to the passage of the bill, because I deem it necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and accordingly it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. CAMPBELL for three weeks, on account of important business.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the special order the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN, will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 1. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] is recognized for forty minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, under the arrangement which has been made I believe I have had ceded to me forty minutes of time?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

[Mr. COX addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I am sufficiently modest to say that in addressing this honorable House I do not expect to change the sentiment of the House upon the pending bill. In fact, I know I will not be discourteous to any member if I say that no speech that has been made or will be made on either side of the Chamber on this question will have that effect.

The opinions of the different political parties of the House are firmly fixed, but it is our duty to speak to the American people on the issues that so vitally affect them, and speak plainly so that they may understand, for it is not for this Congress to decide issues finally, but it is for the people themselves.

I am forcibly impressed with the fickleness of political parties. Had the Republican party framed in its platform of 1896, three years ago, the declarations contained in the currency bill now before the House, no such bill would be here for consideration, for the Republican minority would be so small in the House that it would be useless and ineffective, and instead of President McKinley occupying the high position that he now occupies, another gentleman would be in that place. I refer to the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, of Nebraska. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am profoundly astonished at the Republican party, both for their fickleness, insincerity, and want of conviction and for their lack of statesmanship in failing to see and know what is good for the people and what is wanted by the country. Only a few years ago President McKinley and his entire party were shouting and clamoring for both silver and gold, domestic or otherwise; a little later on they stood for international bimetalism, and now they are as devotedly advocating the single gold standard. The Republican party has taken all the views on the currency question. They have boldly advocated every position. They have traveled all the routes. They have begun at one end of the financial road and landed at the other. Can the people of the country afford to confide in a party whose views are so unfixed and changing? Is the Republican party so shortsighted as to grope along in the darkness, hoping to touch the right and popular chord?

Mr. Chairman, I am glad the issue has at last been made. I am glad to know that the Republican party has made its last running retreat; that they have taken their true stand on the financial question, hoisted their flag, the colors of which can not now be changed, and that they must leave it to be upheld or hauled down by the American people in 1900. This all-important question should be settled for all time to come, and the people only can settle it. The constant agitation and the changes of political policies have done commerce and business relations generally great harm, and the sooner the issue can squarely and fairly be met and determined the better it will be for the country. I am glad that the issue is boiled down to its last analysis and that the question has been made whether this Government shall adopt the single gold standard, pure and simple, or not. I invite the issue and willingly submit it to the American people.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly oppose the pending bill. I see no justification for it and no reason for its enactment except as a political measure. When the President now occupying his position in the White House came into power three years ago all of our currency was on a parity and every dollar was as good as any other dollar. The same is true to-day. Where is the difference? I ask gentlemen. Then the bill has no purpose save the one which has not been declared by gentlemen on the other side. The real purpose in the bill is to make the debts of the country, both governmental and private, payable in gold coin, and another purpose is to give to the national banks of the country greater and more far-reaching power.

Mr. Chairman, our gold is in no danger when domestic complications only afflict us. There is no danger that can arise from internal troubles with regard to it. We all know that our people do not care to handle gold for exchange or as pocket money. It is too heavy, too inconvenient. Gold is not wanted by the people. There is no better evidence of that fact than is to be found in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury himself, showing that it was necessary to issue gold certificates during the last year to meet the wants of the people and the wants of trade. There was not enough of paper money in circulation, and the Secretary of the Treasury acceded to the wishes and demands of the people throughout the country and issued gold certificates which were available for the purposes of trade.

Speaking, sir, for my own people, for the people of the State of Georgia, whom I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor, I can say with absolute safety that they do not want to handle gold, because it is bulky, undesirable, and inconvenient in business transactions. Whenever currency has been shipped to the South to move our crops, it is not in gold, but it is in paper currency, available for use throughout the land, in all parts of it. Gold is not available; it does not pay to ship it; it is undesirable by the people and by the banks in Georgia, and undesirable to the sellers of our cotton crop. Therefore gold is not desired and is not used. What is the evidence that the people do not want gold as a money of circulation in the country? I think that fact is clearly shown by the condition of the Treasury at the present time, and the small quantity of gold in circulation amongst the people. When I tell you that we have in the Treasury millions upon millions of dollars of gold, more than we have ever had in years before, it is a conclusive proof that gold does not circulate amongst the people. It shows that they do not want it.

We talk of the "protection of the parity" of our metallic and other circulating money in this country. Mr. Chairman, that parity needs no protection from home disturbances and unsettled home forces. The only thing that can disturb that parity is an adverse balance of foreign trade to us.

Let us go back to 1893, when we had our great trouble with gold in this country, when gold was leaving the country, and there was serious apprehension in the minds of our financiers that we would have difficulty in meeting the obligations which rested upon gold. What was the difficulty at that time? Why, then we had not only a home demand for gold, so to speak, but we found our reserve being rapidly destroyed by home over-speculation and the balance of trade throughout the world, which was against us in 1893 to the extent of many millions of dollars, thereby causing our gold to go abroad, while in 1892, the year previous, when the high-water mark of prosperity was reached, and the conditions were reversed and gold was in the Treasury, we find that the balance of trade in our favor that year was more than $202,000,000.

In the year 1893, this great balance being against us, more than $100,000,000 in gold flowed from this country. As I say, home panics and home troubles will not cause gold to leave us, and I dare say to-day—although I have no intention or desire to be considered an alarmist, but, on the other hand, would rather be always an upbuilder, because I always desire to see the country grow and go forward rather than go backward—I believe it to be true that we are upon the verge of a panic in the United States at this very day, and especially in the East. Go back and look at the clearing-house statements of the associated banks in New York City for the last ninety days.

The banks have been under a most tremendous strain. Money has loaned within the last sixty days, for one day, at as high a rate as 40 per cent per annum, and on many days it has reached a rate as high as 12 or 15 per cent per annum. What higher evidence could there be that those banks have been strained than the fact that within the last ninety days they have lost more than $100,000,000 of deposits, and consequently have had to call in their call loans to the amount of more than $100,000,000? They have loaned down to low-water mark. They have kept barely enough reserve balances to comply with the law. It appears that they have violated the law and gone below the legal reserve. What stronger evidence is needed that there is a great stringency among the associated banks of New York than that they have called upon the Secretary of the Treasury to come to their rescue, as he did come to their rescue by going to New York and purchasing $25,000,000 worth of bonds within the last two weeks?

I see from yesterday's paper that the moneyed institutions of New York have called upon him further to anticipate the January interest and pay it out now, in order further to relieve the great strain pressing upon them. What is the cause of that? It is the same as in 1893—overtrading, overspeculation; but it comes from a different source at this time than it did in 1893. Then it was by the country at large, but that is not the fact now. There is no overspeculation in the South and West, but it is confined to the East. It comes from the organization of these great trust combinations which are forming. For what purpose do they form? For two purposes. They are not associating themselves together for the simple purpose of building up prices of commodities to force the great masses of the people to pay higher prices, but they have another object in view. They form these great organizations of capital and water their stock, largely for the purpose of getting upon the market and putting immense speculative fortunes into their pockets by means of these combinations.

These securities, amounting to billions of dollars, are now afloat in all our moneyed centers. They are being carried largely by the banks, by the insurance companies, and, in fact, by all moneyed institutions. And I will say, to the credit of these associated banks, that were it not for their kindness toward those large wild-cat trust organizations I dare say that many of them to-day would be broken down and we should have a panic all over this country such as we have never had in the history of the nation. Why, the banks of New York to-day are loaned down to their last dollar, and I can truly say that the South has nearly all of its money in the city banks of New York. It has ten dollars on deposit with the associated banks of New York where it owes those banks one dollar. Supposing this situation had come in the summer, when the West and the South needed this money? But the South and the West do not need it now, because they have sent their commodities into the market and our money has gone East.

Therefore the great absorbing element at the present time consists of these wild-cat trust organizations, whose stocks are known as industrial stocks. Now, suppose that with this terrible strain upon us the trade balance of the world was against us, as it was in 1893, and we should have to send gold abroad to pay the balance. I reiterate, we should have one of the greatest panics known in the history of this country. But that situation does not exist. On the other hand, I am proud to say, and it proves my theory, that the trade of the world is in our favor. Let me state that there are only about $4,000,000,000 in gold in the entire world, and there is a great scramble among the nations of the world for this gold.

The money powers of the world, as soon as they see any indication of distress or weakness in a nation, begin to make inroads to acquire the gold of that nation. That was our situation in 1893. But as long as the trade balance is in our favor we are safe. In 1898 the trade balance in our favor amounted to the immense sum of $617,432,676, and in 1899 it amounted to $538,000,000. With these immense trade balances in our favor this country is safe, and we never can have any such trouble as we had in 1893 in the way of demands for our gold from the outside. And, by the way, I want to say that I am proud of the fact that the South and the West contribute largely to the exports which go to make up that magnificent trade balance in our favor.

The South sends her cotton, that is worth from two to three hundred millions per annum; the West sends its wheat, creating the great trade balance in our favor, and, I am proud to say also, our great manufacturing interests have sent more of their goods abroad than ever before in the history of the country. Therefore I maintain that the only time that we may anticipate any trouble without gold is when the balance of trade is against us. Keep our foreign trade all right, and our money is right. We will never have any trouble with our local money in this country.

To show the wonderful changes in the trade balances, which mean so much to this Government, I beg to submit a table from 1887 to the present time, inclusive:

Year ending—	Total im- ports.	Total ex- ports.	Balance.
			In our favor.	Against us.
1887	$602,319,766	$716,183,211	$23,863,443
1888	722,937,114	695,954,507		$28,002,607
1889	745,131,652	742,401,375		2,730,277
1890	789,310,400	857,828,684		68,518,284
1891	844,916,196	884,480,810		39,564,614
1892	827,402,462	1,030,278,148	202,875,686
1893	866,400,922	847,665,194		18,735,728
1894	654,394,622	892,140,572	237,145,950
1895	731,909,905	807,538,165	75,508,260
1896	779,724,674	882,606,938	102,882,264
1897	764,730,412	1,050,963,556	286,233,144
1898	616,049,654	1,231,482,330	615,432,676
1899	607,148,489	1,227,023,302	520,874,813

The prime cause of the good condition of our country is our splendid trade abroad, sending so much more than we bring back from foreign lands.

There is a provision in the present bill for the establishment of a division of the Treasury Department, known as a division of issue and redemption, making two departments of the Treasury. I think it is claptrap. It reminds us of two doll houses. So long as the trade balance is in our favor we do not need any such division in the Treasury. Suppose the state of affairs were changed, and instead of $529,000,000 in our favor the balance of trade were against us, what would become of this little division scheme? I repeat, it would be looked upon as a mere doll house, to be swept away by the first financial storm.

This bill instead of protecting the Treasury is throwing dangers about it. The proposition to increase the powers of the national banks is un-American, unjust to the whole people, unsound, and inconsistent with the commercial independence and liberty of the people. It creates an alliance between the banks and the Treasury, the heretofore supposed peoples' Treasury, to the detriment of the Treasury. It makes the one dependent on the other, or rather makes the Treasury dependent on the national banks and gives the banks more power and independence. The Treasury has no power to hurt the banks, but the banks have ample power to damage the Treasury.

The bill strikes down nearly one-half of the standard money of this country when it strikes silver. I find that we have $876,000,000 of gold in the United States, but it is a fact that there are $1,400,000,000 of all other kinds of money that becomes dependent on the single gold standard. Therefore, in taking silver away, one of the standard moneys, we are throwing down some of the protection now afforded and thereby increasing the burden upon gold. Gold has to carry the burden of maintaining all this money. Your bill goes on to say that our money must be kept on a parity, every dollar with each other dollar, and it permits the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, to redeem any of it in gold; consequently that makes every dollar of our money redeemable in gold.

Another drawback to the bill is that it will require more money in the Treasury at all times. It demands that an amount of gold and bullion, to constitute a reserve fund equal to 25 per cent of the amount, both of United States notes and Treasury notes issued under act of July 14, 1890, outstanding, shall be held in the division of issue and redemption. I will dare say that this reserve fund will amount upon an average to $110,000,000. Then the amount required to be kept in the general department of the Treasury is $50,000,000 in gold, making a total of $160,000,000 in gold that you must have at all times to answer the requirements of the bill.

I will not say more upon that line, as I want to call attention to another point. I look upon the most dangerous part of the bill to be the power given to a national bank to increase its circulation. Under the present law they are given the power of issuing $240,000,000 to $250,000,000 of circulating notes. Under this bill where banks have a capital of $150,000 they are to carry 25 per cent of their capital in circulating notes. Banks above $150,000 capital are only required to issue $50,000 of circulation. Now a large bank, say of $2,000,000 capital, is only required to issue $50,000 in circulation. But the bill permits these banks to issue to the entire amount of their capital, of course provided the bonds are deposited as required by the bill. Upon investigation I find that we have in this country at the present moment 3,595 national banks, with a total capital, surplus, and accrued profits of $956,000,000. This bill permits these banks to issue to the extent of that capital.

Now you see how they can fluctuate the quantity of the money of this country. I do not mean to say that they are going to take advantage of the power that we give them, but are we willing to sit down and be helpless and say that they shall have that power? It is not American-like to do so. These banks under this bill are permitted to issue as a minimum amount of circulating notes $102,000,000; on the other hand, they are permitted to issue as a maximum amount $956,000,000. See how they can contract or inflate the currency of this country. There is the danger by which they can ebb and flow the amount of their own notes $882,000,000. The fluctuation that they can produce in the issue of the national-bank notes amounts to as much as there is gold in the United States. Now, why shall we confer this great power on the national banks? I believe it is wrong and unnecessary, and I do not believe the American people are willing to do it.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is wrong to place this power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to buy and sell bonds. It looks to me as if it is humbling that great and honored Treasury Department of this country, and while we are adding two departments to the Treasury where heretofore we had only one, why not go further and add a third? Why not establish a brokerage department in the Treasury, and place a sign over the door and tell that "We buy and sell bonds here?" For that is what our Government is doing now. Last year the Secretary sold $200,000,000 worth of bonds, and what has he done in the last ten days or two weeks and is doing now? He is going into the markets and buying them back for the Treasury Department.

Then, truly, we are getting our Treasury at a low point, putting it into the jobbing business to compete with the bond speculators of this country.

Let me say something about the bonds. Who owns the bonds? Who controls them? I have tried to ascertain who owns the war bonds, what percentage the national banks own, but I have been unsuccessful in getting that information. I do, however, get a certain amount of information; and, based upon that, I dare say that the national banks in this country own three-quarters or seven-eighths of the war bonds. Upon investigation I find stored in the Treasury Department of our Government by the national banks $62,352,360 of those 1898 war bonds, stored by national banks to secure circulation. In addition to that I discover deposited in the Treasury $24,672,340 to secure deposits from the Government by the national banks, making a total of $77,030,200 stored by the national banks. They must at least own three-quarters or seven-eighths of that issue.

Let me take up the history of bonds issued by the Government since 1894 until the present time and see how the people have fared. There were sold under the provisions of the war-revenue act approved June 13, 1898, $198,678,720 in bonds. These bonds were sold not in compliance with the law, but in direct opposition to it, as President McKinley conclusively demonstrates in his message to Congress. The law expressly requires that the bonds shall only be sold as the proceeds may be needed to defray the expenditures of the war. The books of the Treasury Department show that at the time these bonds were sold there was over $100,000,000 surplus over and above the one hundred millions required for the reserve fund.

The present cash balance in the Treasury above the $100,000,000 reserve fund being $186,636,998.95, demonstrates clearly that not one dollar of the proceeds of the bonds has ever been necessary, nor has it in fact ever been used. The President, in his message, shows that next year there will be a surplus in the actual receipts of the Government, and therefore the proceeds of the bonds never will be used. It would appear that the haste of the Secretary of the Treasury in disposing of these bonds was caused by a well-grounded fear that the occasion for selling them under the law would never arise, and that if he did not dispose of them then he would never have an opportunity of doing so. The bankers wanted to draw $6,000,000 a year interest out of the United States Treasury, and, submissive to their will, the Administration, openly defying the law, which authorized the issuance of bonds only in case of necessity, has paid the bankers the $6,000,000 a year demanded by them for money which has lain idle in the Treasury ever since it was placed there.

This loan was to be a "popular loan." This fact was heralded throughout the country and was made the subject of many speeches in Congress and on the hustings. It was reported after the loan was made that the bankers had not secured the bonds, but that they had gone to the people. Experience since that time has demonstrated that the banks had their depositors and friends largely to buy up the bonds, and it would be difficult now to find individual holders of these Government securities; but, as I have said, I believe the national banks hold three-fourths to seven-eighths of these bonds.

On December 8 these bonds were quoted in New York at 110½. At this figure the income is 1½ per cent. At this price they find ready sale. The entire issue could be sold in New York at the present figure. This means that the United States Government can borrow all the money that it wants at 1½ per cent. This is what capitalists are willing to take and the price at which the banks can obtain the money with which to buy bonds, and they then secure from the United States Government a profit of more than 100 per cent per year.

In other words, the banks pay for interest on $200,000,000 loan $3,750,000, and the Government pays $6,000,000, leaving $2,250,000 a year clear profit to the banks. It is not necessary that the banks should invest a dollar of capital. They can borrow the money, buy the bonds, and draw $2,250,000 a year for their trouble in writing a letter making a bid.

This does not constitute all of the profits secured by the banks upon an issue of bonds. Two hundred million dollars in bonds sold at par are now worth $1.10 for each $1. This is a profit to the banks in the bonds themselves outside of any consideration of the amounts paid in interest of over $20,000,000.

Treasury Circular No. 123 contains the following information concerning the prior issues of bonds since 1894:

The presentation of United States notes for redemption prior to 1893 was not great enough to reduce the reserve fund below $100,000,000; in April of that year, however, the minimum was reached, and the fund became so low that in February, 1894, an issue of bonds became necessary to enable the Government to restore the gold reserve and redeem the obligations of the United States. Accordingly, popular subscriptions were invited for an issue of $50,000,000 of ten-year 5 per cent bonds, which were dated February 1, 1894, and realized to the Government $58,633,255 in gold. In November, 1894, another issue of $50,000,000 of the same class of bonds was necessary, the sum realized being $58,538,500. In February, 1895, the Government was again obliged to replenish the gold reserve, which it did by the purchase, under contract, of 3,500,000 ounces of gold coin, which were paid for with United States 4 per cent thirty-year bonds, amounting to $62,315,400. Another sale of $100,000,000 of 4 per cent thirty-year bonds was made through popular subscriptions, invited in January, 1896. The total amount of bonds thus issued since 1893 to protect the gold reserve was $262,315,400, and the total proceeds thereof, in gold coin, was $293,454,286.74.

The amount of United States bonds outstanding July 1, 1896, was as follows:
4½ per cent bonds continued at 2 per cent.....	$25,364,500
4 per cent bonds of 1907.....	559,631,850
5 per cent bonds of 1904.....	100,000,000
4 per cent bonds of 1925.....	162,315,400
Total.....	847,311,750

The same bonds which the Government sold for $293,454,286.74 would cost in the market to-day, according to the quotation of Fisk & Robinson, on December 8, $349,753,866, making a profit to the banks of $56,299,580.

During President Harrison's Administration the interest-bearing debt of the United States was $585,029,330. The noninterest-bearing debt was $1,000,648,939.37. In the Treasury statement of the public debt for the month of November, 1899, the interest-bearing debt has been increased to $1,037,049,690. The noninterest-bearing debt has been decreased to $398,048,760.16. The proposition in the currency bill is to wipe out this noninterest-bearing debt by replacing it with interest-bearing debt. The interest paid by the United States Government in 1892 was $22,893,883.25. The interest paid for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899, was $39,896,925.02. The debt of the United States has not been increased since 1892, while the interest charge has been nearly doubled and will be more than doubled by the time the purposes of this bill are carried out. The United States Government had no creditors who were clamorous for their money. Its creditors to whom no interest was paid were entirely satisfied. But under the new theory of statecraft it is urged most strenuously that unless we pay interest upon all the debts we owe we are ruined.

If a merchant in solvent condition should become imbued with the idea that his financial salvation depended upon his being allowed to pay interest to those creditors who did not want interest, an application for a writ of lunacy would be granted by any court in Christendom. This extra $20,000,000 a year, in round numbers, that we are now paying in interest above the amount we paid in 1892 is a subsidy to the banks pure and simple and is not based upon any sound principle of finance.

In December, 1892, President Harrison, in his annual message, called the attention of Congress to the great prosperity which the people of the United States were then enjoying. It is a fact that all of the leading commercial papers make comparisons of prosperity with the year 1892, that being considered universally the high-water mark of national prosperity.

Three months later $61,000,000 in gold was exported from the United States. The banks presented certificates at the United States Treasury and withdrew the gold for exportation. This caused the reserve to fall very rapidly and alarmed the Administration and the business world. The reason for the withdrawal of the gold was the fact that the United States was the only nation, except Russia, which at that time had a surplus of gold. Germany had, a few years before, adopted a single gold standard, and at that time Austria-Hungary did the same. This created an unprecedented demand for gold in Europe, and the United States, being the only nation from which the gold could be procured, had it to furnish.

Seeing in prospective a large profit to be made, as it has been made, out of the issuance of national bonds, a committee of New York bankers called upon President Cleveland and Secretary Carlisle and convinced them that some drastic measure was absolutely necessary. They had themselves created the scarcity of gold and had shipped more than the conditions of business would warrant for the reason that there was an alluring profit to the banks in the shipment of the gold. The Government issued certificates similar in nature to clearing-house certificates, and practically made the United States Treasury a branch clearing house for the New York banks. This did not help matters, because it created an endless-chain arrangement, which continues to deplete the gold reserve in the National Treasury.

The trouble was that the banks in New York had sent away their gold until they had depleted their reserve, and there was no way except by depleting the United States Treasury to restore the gold in the banks that had been shipped to Europe. It had to come from some place, and the United States Treasury was the only place where there was any gold. A special session of Congress was called, the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act was repealed, and bonds were authorized. As soon as the bonds were authorized New York bankers again visited the President, who had been so frightened by what they had told him before that he easily believed them when they told him that the condition of the country was such that a popular bond issue could not be floated, but they would take the bonds, secure the money abroad, and thus replace the gold that had been withdrawn from the Treasury without calling upon any of the American banks to supply it.

To the astonishment of everyone, as soon as this reasonable-looking proposition was accepted, it was found that there was not only enough gold to pay for the bonds, but that this purchase netted the men who made it a little over $8,000,000 in twenty-four hours. The bonds were in active demand at a very considerable advance the day after their issuance. The problem was solved. All that banks required to keep up their gold reserves was to buy bonds from the United States Government, and all that the United States Government required to keep up its gold reserve was to sell bonds to the banks.

Mr. Chairman, I give this history of the bond issues within the past five years, including last year, to show the profits made from Government bond sales, which profits are enjoyed by the few and paid by the many.

Mr. Chairman, I will not discuss the bill further, but I trust soon to see the financial questions of this country settled finally and settled in accordance with the wishes of the great mass of the people of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, that this bill will pass in this House seems to be a foregone conclusion; but before it shall be done I desire to record my profound and conscientious opposition to its provisions.

During all the years of my Congressional service I have stood firmly against what it contemplates, and nothing has occurred to change the deliberate convictions I have formed and uniformly sustained by vote and voice with all the earnestness of my nature.

I shall not essay elaborate argument, but will attempt to epitomize a few essential objections, which, however, have already been better stated than I can hope to do.

It is proposed to now do openly what it is charged and believed was covertly attempted to be done more than a quarter of a century ago and which, when discovered, quickened the resentment and aroused the righteous indignation of the whole country.

It is proposed by positive enactment to degrade, if not destroy, one of the great constitutional money metals of the centuries and to narrow and weaken the foundation upon which rests the superstructure of our paper currency.

One-half of the basis of redemption is to be removed and the work and doctrines and interpretations of the ablest statesmen and constitutional expositors of bygone years are to be swept away as with the besom of destruction. The ancient landmarks are to be obliterated. Old principles are to be repudiated. Reverence for the fathers is to be no more.

Oh, what a radical, cruel, and far-reaching iconoclasm is about to be perpetrated, and with what indecent haste is the rush to its accomplishment! The unit of value sanctioned by the best thought and research of our sires and the experience and "reason of strength" of fourscore years is to be cast out as vile and unworthy to occupy the place to which it was originally assigned in our monetary system.

There is to be no obscuration of its discredit and no incertitude as to its degradation. While it is insisted that it is already down and lying helpless before its enemies and its face drawn up in death, yet lethal missiles must be hurled in and upon its pallid corpse. It must be crucified afresh. Dead men tell no tales. Fear you a resurrection? Entomb it if you will, mount your guards, station your soldiers, but know ye that your custody of it will be temporary and that bimetalism, the vital principle it represents, will live again, and know further that for what you do now you shall yet be brought to judgment!

It is proposed to change the obligation of contracts, public and private, and, moved by the clamor of ex parte insistence, to insert through statutory force in such contracts words and stipulations never contemplated by the parties to them, and, in violation of solemn covenants and declarations, to destroy the equities of debtors without their consent. The amount "nominated in the bond" is insufficient; the "pound of flesh" is not enough; the severity must be intensified; the yoke must be made harder, the burden heavier. In all good conscience and by all the rules and proprieties of honest civilization and fair dealing among men, I deny the right of Government and the function of legislation to add a single grain to the weight of preexisting debt or to superimpose an additional burden to the back of toil.

It seems to me that the inevitable effect of the passage of this bill will be to contract the money supply and to reduce the circulation, to make the medium of exchange scarcer and thereby more difficult to obtain, and I assert, as a postulate of common and grievous experience and historic truth, that scarce money means hard times the world over. But it is contended that the genesis of the gold mines will meet any contraction that may ensue and that favorable balances of trade will continue to prevent the exportation of gold. Who knows when the mines will be exhausted or their yield diminished? Who knows when drought and disaster shall come upon us, when the crops shall fail, when the "rain of the land shall be powder and dust, and the heavens shall be as brass and the earth as iron," and the labor of the husbandman shall not avail? I beg the authors and supporters of this bill that they will not permit their optimism to turn their heads, and admonish them that it is neither safe nor wise to depend upon roseate views of the future. Good times and hard times have chased each other since the world began. It is the prudent thing to anticipate and provide against calamity.

It is proposed to confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to issue at his discretion bonds payable in gold. This is a dangerous power with which to invest any officer of the Government. Some of us have not forgotten how such discretionary power has been exercised in utter disregard of what we believed to be the true interests of the people and contrary to the spirit and intention of the law. The man does not live, Democrat or Republican, into whose hands I would be willing to confide such authority. Bond issues and the circumstances attending them will always constitute a dark chapter in our public annals.

It is proposed to increase the dominion of the national banks over the finances of the country. To this I am unalterably opposed.

Finally, it is proposed to overturn every contention for which the great majority of the Democratic party has stood in all the years in so far as the subject-matter of the bill relates to the same, and to fully establish the sway of money over man. I should do violence to my honest conclusions, contradict my past record and utterances, and, from my standpoint, aid in the infliction of unmeasured evils upon my country, if I were to do otherwise than to oppose and protest against the passage of this bill. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, that unparalleled activity prevails in all lines of commerce and production seems to be conceded by all members of this House. It is not necessary to go to statistical tables to discover the revival of business conditions throughout the country. The story may be read in the faces of the multitude. Let one who was familiar with the conditions, with the downcast expression of the people in the late business crisis, go through the country now and he will be impressed with a marked change. During that melancholy experience you could read the awful story of misfortune and distress on every brow, but to-day you can see the sign of buoyant hope beaming from every countenance. That remarkable transformation is a subject worthy of the time and attention of the psychologist as well as the statesman.

Our friends on the other side of the Chamber are willing to concede that a marvelous change came over the country in a very short period, but they will not admit that it was the result of Republican success even in a slight degree. They charge all the misfortunes of the people to the Republican party and give the Lord credit for all the blessings that come. We have the argument of coincidence, and that ought to prevail over the general assertion that the country is prosperous in spite of, and not on account of, the present Administration, especially when we keep in mind the fact that times have always been good when Republican policies were being administered. No one was able to say that times were good during the late Democratic Administration in spite of the policy of the party then in power.

Under the first Administration of President Cleveland the country enjoyed a fair degree of prosperity, and the people were led to believe that Democratic success was not a menace to the business interests of the country as the Republican orators had so earnestly insisted, and in 1893, in an hour of thoughtlessness, they gave him another term. This time he was supported by a Democratic Congress in both branches, and for the first time for over thirty years that party was permitted to take charge of the vast interests of the country. We all know the result; and if the people gathered any wisdom from that melancholy experience, it will be more than thirty years before we have another Democratic Administration. It is easy to understand now why the first Cleveland Administration was a success. The Congress was Republican in one or both branches all the time, and the President was obliged to administer Republican laws and policies, so he could not do much injury. But when all departments of the Government were under Democratic control, the Lord departed from Israel and distress and destitution possessed the whole land. No Republican rose in his place on this floor then and said, "The land is blessed notwithstanding your party policies."

Many of us believe that the crisis of 1893 was either precipitated or aggravated by infirmities in the revenue and financial policies threatened at that time, and in my judgment it would be almost a criminal omission for this Administration, at this time of unequaled prosperity, to fail to correct those infirmities. We have already disposed of the revenue question with acknowledged success, and we now have before us a question of no less importance, looking to certain reforms in the currency system. The bill under consideration will correct some fundamental weaknesses in our system that were made conspicuous by their capacity for mischief a few short years ago. Our friends on the other side of the Chamber predict dire calamity to the country as the result of the legislation now proposed. They even go so far as to say that if the bill shall become a law it will result in another Democratic Administration. I confess, sir, that no greater misfortune than that could be conceived of. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If the bill can have any possible influence in promoting the candidacy of the idol of the Democratic heart, that great political necromancer from Nebraska, it could only be upon the theory that it would operate as a legislative strait-jacket and minimize his capacity for evil if he should become President. It might tend to assure the country against the danger of free silver even with a Democratic President, and there might seem less occasion to use that vigilance necessary to keep the Government in safe hands. I hope that after a few years we will have the affairs of the country on so firm a basis that it would not be wrecked by a Democratic President, though I have no thought that the people seriously contemplate such an eventuality. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The bill is simple in its provisions and it does not go beyond that which seems reasonably required by the situation. Deference must always be had to the customs and business habits of the people and only such changes made in legislation vitally affecting the important interests of the country as the conditions seem ripe for. There is no need now for any sweeping and radical reforms in banking and currency laws, and if adopted they would seriously disturb the healthy conditions that now prevail, for a time, at least. But since we have discovered elements of weakness in our currency system, we owe it to the country to correct those defects so far as it is in our power to do so, and wait for time to bring about other changes that may become necessary. They must come by natural growth, the slow and unerring process of evolution. Gentlemen decry the gold standard and expatiate upon the virtues of bimetalism. The gold standard seems still to be the nightmare of the Democratic party.

A superficial examination of the provisions of this bill will convince every fair mind that it will effect no change in the currency standard, but its purpose is simply to enact into law that which has been the administrative policy of the Government for the last quarter of a century. If it shall become a law a free-silver President could not put the currency of the country on a silver basis without the cooperation of both branches of Congress. Bimetalism is a fallacy, and every student of economic history must know it. We have had two bimetallic laws under which both gold and silver could be coined upon equal terms, and there has never been a day or an hour in the history of this Government when American gold and American silver traveled side by side in the channels of trade under a free-coinage law. It is an absolute and utter impossibility, and gentlemen who talk about bimetalism under a free-coinage policy at the arbitrary ratio of 16 to 1 mean a monometallic silver currency; that and nothing less. It can have no other possible operation.

The purpose of this bill is to put the country on a gold standard by legislation, so that a hostile Administration in future years can not disturb business conditions. We can not, by legislation, fix the standard of value. That is fixed by laws beyond the power of this body to repeal or change. But Congress has the power to impart to money its legal-tender quality, and in that lies the importance of this whole question. The fear that a free-silver Administration might discharge the obligations of the Government in a cheap currency is a constant menace to the commercial and industrial world. But this measure does not take away the legal-tender quality of greenbacks or silver. Those forms of money are still a full legal tender for the payment of all private debts and ordinary public demands in the same manner as under the present law, but they are to be more firmly anchored to gold, with the view of preserving their parity. Money has three prime functions, we are told by scientific economists. It is a medium of exchange, a denominator of value, and a means for the payment of debt.

It is in relation to the last function that the importance of this bill may be discovered. It provides that debts shall be paid in the same kind of money that was contemplated by the parties at the time the debts were made. It provides that Government bonds and Treasury notes shall be paid in gold, and this is said to be unfair because it discriminates in favor of the bondholders. There can be no discrimination as long as all forms of our currency are kept at a common parity. The bondholder has been paid in gold ever since resumption became a fact. This bill creates no change in the practice of the Government in that particular.

Gentlemen tell us that the Government creditor and the private creditor stand upon an equal footing, when a moment's reflection will demonstrate to any fair mind that that is a stupid fallacy. It must be kept in mind that the Government is sovereign and gives money its legal-tender power, and if it should insist upon the right to coin money at will and compel its creditors to accept whatever was so coined in satisfaction of their demands, the public credit would be infinitely lower than it is to-day. Imagine, if you can, the case of a private debtor having the power to issue money and make it a legal tender. His creditor would insist upon the right to stipulate in the contract the character of money in which the obligation should be discharged or there would be no contract. No government that does not pay its obligations in the best money of the world can maintain its credit. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the vital principle in this bill.

Gentlemen tell us that the gold dollar has appreciated; that prices have gone down. I concede that the tendency for the last twenty-five years has been toward lower prices, but as a rule that has been a legitimate tendency. It has come about mainly from natural industrial development, the perfection of productive methods, and when the comforts and conveniences of life may be had more cheaply as the result of natural industrial growth it is the very highest evidence of prosperity. It brings to the homes and to the lives of our people more of the comforts and blessings that we all live to enjoy. In 1896, when the political soothsayers met at Chicago and fulminated the new Democratic creed, the dollar had taken on considerable unnecessary adipose. It was clumsy and disinclined to activity, for it had taken no kind of exercise for several years, and that was all it needed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This bill, Mr. Chairman, contains a number of other features, of more or less importance, which I have not the time to discuss elaborately. One is that it creates a division in the Treasury Department of issue and redemption and provides for a segregated redemption fund. Under the present system the redemption fund consists simply of a general balance in the Treasury, and is liable for the payment of common obligations against the Government. A permanent redemption fund should be provided in order that our obligations and paper currency may be redeemed upon presentation without question or quibble.

The bill also confers power on the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds without limit when it shall be necessary to replenish the redemption fund. Gentlemen complain of this arbitrary power; and I confess, Mr. Chairman, that it is a power that it is possible to abuse; but no scheme of government has ever been wrought out by the genius of man that does not repose a large discretion respecting its most important functions in the wisdom and patriotism of its officials. If we are to presume that all men are dishonest, government must be regarded as a failure. If the power that this bill confers upon the Secretary of the Treasury had lodged there during the last Cleveland Administration I believe it would have saved the Government $100,000,000 at least. The vesting of the power is a guaranty that all the resources of the Government are not only pledged but are immediately available for the purposes of maintaining the public credit and is the highest safeguard against the necessity for ever having to use the power at all.

The bill provides that when greenbacks and Sherman notes shall have been redeemed they shall not be reissued except in exchange for gold. Provision is made, however, for the transfer from the division of issue and redemption to the common fund of any redeemed paper at the discretion of the Secretary, and by this means redeemed paper may get into circulation again. The greenback is the most popular form of currency the country ever had. Every dollar is good the world over, and it is so sacredly associated with the days of our greatest calamity that it is canonized in the hearts of the people. But, notwithstanding all that, during the recent crisis the greenback was the greatest menace to public credit and proved to be a costly form of money. It was used to deplete the gold reserve, and it was a most effective agency in that work. When business conditions are normal the greenback will not be presented for redemption, because it is a more convenient form of money than gold or silver, and all that which finds its way into the Treasury in ordinary fiscal channels will be reissued. When conditions are disturbed and gold is in demand, greenbacks that have been redeemed will be held in the Treasury so they can not be used repeatedly to deplete the stock of gold. When conditions improve they may be transferred to the common fund and again go into circulation. This is one of the wisest and most judicious provisions of the bill. A moment's reflection will satisfy everyone of its value as a preserver of the public credit.

The talk about contraction is destitute of force. Provision is made for the exchange of gold for all other kinds of money whenever it shall be necessary to maintain the parity. This also is merely the enactment of the present policy into positive law.

The bill authorizes banks in small communities with a capital of $25,000. Under the present law no bank can be organized with less than $50,000 capital. The modification will enable many small towns to be supplied with banking facilities and loanable capital that are denied those advantages now. It will have a beneficial operation, because it will have a tendency to distribute money in all parts of the country. Then, it authorizes national banks to issue currency to the par value of the bonds they are required to deposit. This privilege will cost the country nothing, and it will impart to the currency an element of elasticity that will better meet the demands of exigencies as they arise.

The circulation of banks is relieved from the tax of 1 per cent that it now bears, and a tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent per annum is placed upon the capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits. The bank circulation now is $200,000,000, in round numbers, and the annual tax is $2,000,000. The capital, surplus, and undivided profits of national banks aggregate $1,000,000,000, in round numbers, and one-fifth of 1 per cent on this basis will yield $2,000,000 a year. The amount of taxes the Government will receive under this bill, if it becomes a law, will be the same as it receives upon circulation now, but it will be distributed more equitably. In large cities banks with large capital take out but little circulation and pay an inequitably small share of the circulation tax. Banks in the country towns take out the maximum amount of circulation as a rule and consequently pay a disproportionately large share of the taxes. This bill will equalize the burden by taking from the taxation of small banks in the country towns and adding to those of large capital in the large cities. Those large banks enjoy the prestige that the national banking system of organization and supervision gives, and they ought to pay for it.

The effect of the bill will be to increase the bank circulation, and an abundance of money for all purposes will be constantly maintained. It gives banks additional privileges without costing the Government a dollar. Banks are an indispensable factor in commerce and production, and I am in favor of all measures that will increase their legitimate functions. I would so limit and control their power that they can not become agencies of oppression, and yet so regulate them that they may subserve the business needs of the country in the highest degree. They should be servants and not masters. This bill will give them no dangerous power. We hear the criticism that the bill will enhance the value of Government bonds. It can not to any great extent, because they are now selling in the markets at a price that will yield less than 2 per cent per annum on the investment. But it is no objection to legislation that it will improve business and make property more valuable. It is better than if it would tear down, depreciate, and destroy. The bill is wise in all its provisions and amply meets every requirement of the times. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for twenty minutes. Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, my interest in the subject of this discussion grows out of a lifelong connection with business affairs. My interest in the bill itself comes from my connection with the caucus committee which prepared it.

After the able presentation and explanation of all its provisions by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] in opening the debate, there is very little that any other member of the committee need or can say. I will therefore address myself only to a few general remarks pertinent to the subject.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before the committee deals with the fundamental principles of finance. In affirming and fixing the gold standard it puts down an anchor for a stable currency that no amount of political clamor nor change of party can drag from its moorings. In providing for the maintenance of the parity of all moneys it prescribes directions for a Secretary of the Treasury that must be observed; whoever comes after would be a bold man and deserving of impeachment should he disregard them. This bill should receive the commendation of our silver friends for what it does for silver. It not only carries the entire silver coinage on a parity with gold, but provides for the direct or representative use of it by making the silver certificates of denominations of $5 and under. This will insure the circulation of silver or small bills to the most remote parts of the country. If I mistake not, the business of the country will find use for every dollar so issued. I have heard free-silver advocates avow that this was all the recognition they asked for silver.

I have during the last few months traveled through nearly all the Southern States, and have taken occasion to talk with business and financial men, and almost without exception they have expressed themselves as not averse to the gold standard; but say they: "We are obliged to favor free silver because we are obliged to be Democrats." A singular illustration of cause and effect.

My friend from Tennessee [Mr. COX] has just said that we are here to obey the mandates of those who sent us here. No man ever uttered a truer word. We are here to obey the mandates of those who sent us here. Is he here in obedience to the mandate of his constituents in opposing this measure?

Mr. Chairman, every provision of this bill is a sound business proposition, and when adopted by Congress will afford the basis on which to form a good banking law. These, then, are the fundamentals or essentials of financial reform; all the exact propositions that need to be stated. Now, banking is not an exact science. It does not follow that one and only one banking law can be right. There are many methods of accomplishing the same end that may be good, perhaps equally good and operative, provided the basis be correctly established. For one, I do not think that a banking law need be very complex or abstruse. It seems to me that all the necessary provisions and safeguards can be stated in simple language, which all people of reasonable intelligence can understand.

Recognizing the principles of this bill, I believe that each and every member of the Banking and Currency Committee, be he from this side of the House or the other, could frame a banking bill that would not only be operative and satisfactory to the people, but several of such bills would probably be so nearly equal in merit as to make it hard to choose between them. Who knows but that if this bill had been a law before the last Congress the perpetual love feast held upstairs in the room of the Banking and Currency Committee might have been fruitful of a perfect banking bill under the leadership of that able, genial, and conciliating statesman, my late honored colleague from Massachusetts. Just here I think it only fair to say that great credit is due to the Banking and Currency Committee of the Fifty-fifth Congress, in that its work afforded the basis of this bill and greatly facilitated the labors of those who prepared it.

The last three sections of this bill contain all that relates to banking, and to my mind it is necessary that they should become law as soon as possible to meet the demand for circulation growing out of the deluge of prosperity that is sweeping over the country to-day.

I have listened very carefully to the speeches that have been made on the other side of the House, and I have listened in vain for any words in defense of the 16 to 1 standard. Our friends have fallen back upon the quantitative theory, and have not only appropriated the $385,000,000 of increased coinage, but now say that if that be a good thing then the unlimited coinage of silver would be so much the more desirable, forgetting that it is the increase of business that makes the increased demand and use for money.

We have to-day $2,000,000,000 of money in use in the United States, a larger amount than was ever known in the history of the country, and it is the purpose of this bill to make it world money, good as gold everywhere; and yet business has increased to the extent that more circulation is needed at once, and why? Let me show by illustration why. It is the custom in New England, and especially in Massachusetts, where it is in conformity with the law, to make weekly payments of wages, and all such wages are paid in cash. This has the effect of keeping money in the community.

With the increase of 10 per cent in wages which has recently taken place in most of our industries, and which I am glad to see has extended all over the country, even to the South and other free-silver sections, it requires just that proportionate increase of money to meet the demand. Not only this, but the increased value of all products requires an increased volume of circulation.

It costs a cotton manufacturer in New England 33 per cent more to put in his cotton this year than it did last. Where he paid 6 cents for his cotton then, he has now to pay 8 cents, in round numbers. Although the cotton crop of this year bids fair to be one and one-half million bales less than last year, the farmer will receive $20,000,000 more for his crop.

The relief which this bill affords is much needed. The question was asked the other day as to what was the crop of last year. I will say that the cotton season ends on the 31st day of August. The crop of last year was, in round numbers, 11,216,000 bales. It was also asked what the crop would be this year. No one can tell with absolute certainty. It has been variously estimated at from under 9,000,000 bales up to about 11,000,000. The best authority I can find places the crop at something under 10,000,000 bales, or about 9,700,000 bales.

The necessity for it is the legitimate outgrowth of the return of normal conditions of prosperity incident to the wise policy of a business Administration.

As I listened to the eloquent gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], and heard him alternately deny that there was prosperity and then explain why there was prosperity, my mind went back to the time when I left my State to come to the Fifty-fifth Congress, and I could but contrast the situation at home then with that which I left when I came to the Fifty-sixth Congress. Then the closed doors and smokeless chimneys of idle mills were seen on all sides, and the silence was only broken by the footsteps of the watchman who was left as caretaker of the property and to guard the large warehouses filled with goods for which there was no market.

On the streets were gathered the men and women, bemoaning their misfortune and enforced idleness, sadly husbanding their scanty resources, or turning in despair to the charitable societies or soup houses.

How different the scenes I have just left. Every furnace burning, chimneys smoking, every spindle humming, and every loom beating, making cloth to be sold even before it is finished. There are none who are willing or care to work but can find employment at good wages.

I found the same condition of prosperity in the South. Every wheel was turning, in many cases night and day, and there was a scarcity of labor everywhere. I have reason to know, from my own business interests in the South, that it is not easy to get sufficient labor, and wages have continually advanced.

In the eloquent argument of the gentleman from Missouri last Monday he undertook, in a part of his remarks, to apologize for the state of prosperity in which he found the country and to explain it away on the score of the increased volume of circulation. Then, in another part of his address, he devoted himself to a complaint of high prices of the staple products and manufactures of the country and fell to beating and belaboring trusts.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not here to defend all the features or to deny all the evils that have been attributed to trusts, but I would like to ask my friend if it is a hardship and if it is due to a trust that the Southern planters will probably receive $20,000,000 more for their cotton than they did last year? Is it the fault of trusts that the iron mines of Pennsylvania and Alabama are receiving from 50 to 100 per cent more for their output than they did a year ago? Is it the fault of any trust that the uses for iron have within the last five years multiplied themselves three or four times? Is it due to trusts that the new uses for structural iron have so increased in all classes of buildings? Are trusts responsible for the development of electricity in all its departments, which has multiplied the uses for iron and copper?

The law of supply and demand is as potent and inexorable as the law of gravitation, and the moment the demand falls off or ceases the price must fall to meet it, and no trust in the world can for any length of time stand up against it.

Whatever form the opposition to trusts shall take it must not be in the direction of their suppression. It may regulate, it may exact publicity in their acts and accounts, but it must not seriously interfere with the free cooperation of capital. For just as sure as such cooperation is forbidden or crushed out by law a worse evil will arise to take its place. The individual Croesus will grow and fasten himself, like the old man of the sea, upon the back of the public. He is not responsible to anyone, while the corporations are not only bound by their charters, but are responsible to thousands and tens of thousands of stockholders.

Combination and cooperation of capital are safeguards against great single capitalists whose power of monopoly is many times greater than that of any corporation. The only remedy of an oppressed people in such a case is to combine their capital to compete with and overcome the monopoly. If you deny them this power, you not only offer a premium to the plutocrat, but you secure him in his monopoly.

It seems to me that there is a great deal of senseless and unreasoning talk about trusts. I do not propose to champion them. In so far as they are honestly organized and administered on business principles, they can take care of themselves. In so far as they are dishonestly organized and conducted, there is law enough, if properly enforced, to keep them within bounds.

In so far as they defy correct business principles by piling up fictitious capital and inordinately capitalizing their expectations, they become top-heavy and contain within themselves the seeds of their own dissolution.

Wall street has a cold-blooded way of finding the vulnerable points in such concerns, and while it may help them up at the start, it is sure to kick them down at the first opportunity.

Mr. Chairman, as this country grows in population and develops its resources it must grow in its revenues and in its expenditures. Figures that once seemed enormous with a population of 40,000,000 now look small with a population of 75,000,000 and will dwindle more and more as we approach 100,000,000.

I mistake the temper of the American people if many of them can be much longer deceived by a mere array of figures. I mistake their temper also if they can be longer cajoled by the cheap silver dollar.

While our business at home and our trade abroad increases to almost fabulous proportions let us see to it that the quality of our money be not cheapened in the eyes of the world nor in the pockets of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] and others who have preceded me have so fully and clearly explained all the details of this bill that I shall confine the few remarks which I shall make to a discussion of its general principles. It might aptly be entitled "A bill to continue confidence and perpetuate prosperity." The amount of currency in circulation is not comparable in importance to the maintenance of confidence in the uniformity and stability of its standard and of what we term business confidence.

The useful purposes of money are three: First, to serve as the measure of values; second, as a medium of exchange—the go-between in the exchange of commodities from one man to another and in the adjustment of balances, and, third, as the basis of contracts to be performed in the future. Centuries ago money of some kind was necessary in every transaction. People did not trust each other. There was no credit. But with increasing civilization came increased trust and confidence, so that now 95 per cent of the business of this country is conducted without the actual use of money at all, but by operations involving confidence.

I may be pardoned a few illustrations from my own State. The president of the Pennsylvania Steel Company, one of the largest manufacturing institutions in the country, told me that of the millions of dollars received by that company for its products in a single year not one farthing was paid in currency or what we call money. It was all by check or draft or bill of exchange or other means involving confidence. For all the ores and coal and other material purchased by it that company did not pay out one cent in currency. Its employees were all paid by check, save where the amount was less than $20.

Out of some $12,000,000 received in a single year at the Pennsylvania State treasury only $2,000 was paid in money or currency. These are but samples of the way in which business is done everywhere.

While checks represent money, it is a mistake to suppose that money always changes hands in payment of them. They are usually settled by "clearings" between the banks upon which they are drawn. An officer in a prominent bank in my own city told me that recently in clearing with another bank, although there were many checks involved, the difference between those drawn upon his bank and presented by the other and those held by his bank against the other was only 3 cents; so that, although thousands of dollars were represented by the checks, they were all liquidated and paid by an actual exchange of only 3 cents in money.

The exchanges at the New York Clearing House from January 2, 1899, to November 30, 1899, aggregated $55,413,506,034.04, while the actual currency required to redeem that vast volume of what I may term credit money was only $2,888,214,065.64, or a trifle over 5 per cent. In some years it has been less than 5 per cent.

In addition to the enormous volume of business represented by checks there is the farther enormous volume represented by short-time notes, bills payable, etc., constantly given and received by every individual, firm, partnership, and corporation largely engaged in business. These are also matters involving confidence. When confidence is general, they, as well as checks, are used freely; but when either national or individual confidence is impaired or shaken, these great and necessary aids to business are less available. Those who would tamper with the currency or render its condition uncertain do not take into consideration the potent influence of credit. Whatever impairs the integrity of a nation, of a corporation, or of an individual impairs its credit; whatever impairs credit and weakens confidence lessens commerce, and whatever lessens commerce results injuriously to all the people. There are many ways in which public confidence—business confidence—may be impaired. It has always been impaired to a greater or less degree by the election of a Democratic Administration and strengthened by Republican success, as a few modern instances will suffice to show. The election of a Democratic President in 1892 gave rise to the belief that under the free-trade theories which he and his party were likely to enact into law the manufacturing and mining industries of the country could not thrive.

Confidence in their ability to meet their obligations was impaired, their notes were thrown out by banks, their credit weakened, their ability to continue business ceased, and thousands of them went to the wall. As a necessary result the business of railroads decreased, and only the strongest of them were able to keep their properties out of the hands of the receiver. The enactment of the Wilson bill increased the distrust, and when to all this there was added the threat and serious danger of the free coinage of silver, rendering uncertain the unit of value and the obligation of contracts, the climax was reached.

With the impending triumph of Bryan and the free-coinage theory, no man possessing a good dollar was willing to invest it, uncertain of the character or value of the dollar which he might eventually receive in return. Consequently business enterprises were shut down and commerce was nearer at a standstill than it had been for many years before. Hundreds of thousands of men were out of employment. Capital was idle. Every day recorded additional business failures. The assignee and the receiver were in supreme control.

These conditions of distrust affected the amount of money in circulation, for while in 1892, the last year of Republican Administration, the amount in circulation for each man, woman, and child in the United States was $34.44, the highest up to that time known in the history of the country, the per capita had been reduced in 1896 to $21.10. And even that, although nominally in circulation—because in the country and not in the Treasury—did not actually circulate with the same activity and represent the same volume of business as in times of greater confidence. The great volume of check and credit transactions was immeasurably reduced.

The whole country was saved from bankruptcy only by the fortunate defeat of Bryan and the pernicious credit and commerce destroying theories advocated by him and his followers and embodied in the Chicago platform. With the election of McKinley there immediately began a restoration of confidence. This was aided by the repeal of the Wilson tariff bill and the enactment of the Dingley bill, thus assuring the country of reasonable protection to American industries and to American labor.

The election of a Republican President and of a Republican House of Representatives insured the public against any legislation debasing the currency; and finally the election of a Republican Senate inspired the people with confidence, born of the knowledge that the Republican party always keeps its pledges; that affirmative legislation would be enacted, making impossible, at least for a long time to come, the destruction of the existing gold standard. [Applause.]

The result of this confidence is seen on every hand. The products of our mines are greater than ever before; our factories are breaking all records; our railroads are absolutely congested with traffic. We have had in Pennsylvania recently the singular spectacle of a railroad company unable to move all its coal tonnage because it could not get cars, while the factory engaged in filling its order for cars was compelled to suspend operations because the overburdened railroads could not supply it with coal.

The armies that fought the battle of Gettysburg were smaller in number than the army of additional railway men employed since the defeat of Bryan. But the army of additional railway men is not comparable to the vast armies of men in other pursuits idle in 1896 who are now employed at living wages.

Mr. James Campbell, the efficient factory inspector of Pennsylvania, has favored me with advance sheets of his annual report for the year ending October 31, 1899, covering 11,355 factory establishments, concerning which he says:

Three hundred and twenty-eight thousand and eight more persons were employed in 1899 than in 1896; 233,915 more persons were employed in 1899 than in 1897; 182,207 more persons were employed in 1899 than in 1898, and if the demand for skilled workers and laborers could be supplied the increase would be greater.

To refer to my own district, a single company employing 4,002 men in 1896 employs 6,315 to-day. This is only a sample—only an index to the conditions which exist throughout the length and breadth of the land. There is not an able-bodied man in this whole country who can not find employment at living wages, and every day we read of increases in wages.

I have just read in the North American, that in certain parts of Philadelphia there is great activity in real estate, caused by the fact that workmen, who have heretofore been content to live in humble rented tenements are, as the result of improved conditions, beginning to purchase homes for themselves.

The amount of money in the United States has increased steadily since the defeat of Bryan, so that, while in 1896 we had $2,347,306,006, we had on the 1st day of July, 1899, $2,745,350,508—an increase of nearly $400,000,000, and the per capita of money in circulation had increased from $21.10 in 1896 to $25 now—the highest point ever known. And as the result of restored confidence and improved business conditions, this per capita of currency actually circulates and performs the functions for which it was intended. [Applause.]

My friend, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], admits that universal prosperity has followed the defeat of Bryan and the election of a Republican Administration; but he does not give us any part of the credit. He attributes the result entirely to the forces of nature. The varying wheat crops in this and other countries, he says, are responsible. But that same gentleman and others told us in 1896 that wheat and silver marched hand in hand, that their fortunes were inseparably linked together.

When wheat is low they blame the Republican party and the gold basis; when prosperity everywhere abounds they give all the credit to nature. Of course, good crops help, and the forces of nature do sometimes seem to fight for the Republican cause. Nature is not wholly responsible for enabling the great Pennsylvania Steel Company, at my home, which went into bankruptcy under a Democratic Administration, to pay out $2,730,047.64 in wages to employees in 1898. Nature is not wholly responsible for the fact that at one time within the present year there were standing upon the sidings at the works of that company 43 cars loaded with structural iron bound for India, literally "on the road to Mandalay," to fill part of a $900,000 bridge contract. I do not think that nature is entitled to all the credit for putting at work the 328,008 additional factory hands in Pennsylvania. The restored confidence in proper protection to American labor and in the maintenance of the integrity of our currency and of public and private obligations has had even more to do with it.

Every taxpayer in the land has been benefited by this improved confidence in another way, to which I call your attention. Nearly every county, city, borough, and school district has, since the defeat of Bryan and the free-coinage theory, either refunded old loans or by borrowing created new ones at reduced rates of interest, so that whereas they formerly paid 5, 6, or 7 per cent, they now pay 4, 3½, and in many instances as low as 3 per cent in interest, the difference being saved to taxpayers.

This has largely come about because of the fact that the people who invest in bonds have confidence that the good money which they put into them will be eventually repaid in dollars equally good. The Federal Government borrowed money readily at 3 per cent in the midst of war with a foreign nation, while the preceding Democratic Administration paid 4 per cent in a time of profound peace. The American taxpayer may take comfort in contrasting his present condition with that prevailing in free-silver Mexico, whose people are taxed to enable the Government to pay $13 in silver as interest upon every $100 of loans held by nonresidents.

We are now and for many years past have been upon the gold standard, but the condition of the law is such that a Democratic President or Secretary of the Treasury alone, without any action by Congress, might instantly overthrow this condition and put us at once upon a different basis. We who are Republicans owe it to the people and to the country, now that we are in power, to enact such positive legislation as shall carry out the pledges made in our party platforms, both State and national, and continue the present favorable business conditions. This bill is intended to effectuate that purpose. It reaffirms the gold standard by declaring in its first section that the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the gold dollar of its present weight and fineness.

It positively enacts in its second section that the interest-bearing obligations of the United States now existing or hereafter to be entered into shall be deemed to be payable according to that standard, thus taking it out of the power of the President or the Secretary of the Treasury alone to affect their integrity or impair their value. It provides that all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in section 1. It expressly provides against affecting the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar or of our paper currency. It provides that all our money shall be kept upon a parity with gold, and anchors us firmly to the gold basis, upon which the country is now enjoying such universal and unbounded prosperity. [Applause.]

Gentlemen upon the other side of the House claim that some gentlemen on this side must, in order to support this bill, make a change of front. Our platform of 1896 pledged the party to the maintenance of "the existing gold standard," and declared that "all our silver and paper currency must be maintained at parity with gold." We all stand upon that platform to-day. You stood upon a platform which demanded the free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1 and were overwhelmingly defeated at the polls.

The Republicans of Pennsylvania, in their convention of 1896 and each year since, have demanded the maintenance of the existing gold standard of value as necessary "to restore and preserve the industrial prosperity of the Union," and there every Republican member from Pennsylvania stands to-day. If any Democratic member from Pennsylvania upon the floor of this House contemplates voting against this bill, I call his attention to the platform adopted by the Democrats of Pennsylvania in State convention assembled in 1896, about sixty days before the nomination of Bryan.

That Democratic State convention, which assembled at Allentown April 29, 1896, unanimously resolved that—Congress should enact such legislation as will give to the country a banking currency ample in volume for the needs of business, absolutely secure under every contingency, and at all times redeemable in gold. We are in favor of a firm, unvarying maintenance of the gold standard. * * * We believe that the interests of the people demand that the earnings of trade, agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, and especially the wages of labor, should be paid in money of the highest intrinsic value and of the highest standard adopted by the civilized nations of the world.

I bring that Democratic platform to the attention of every Democratic member from Pennsylvania, and, indeed, to every gentleman upon the other side of this House, and suggest to them that time has demonstrated its wisdom. Upon that point both parties in Pennsylvania agreed early in 1896, and the Republicans have not changed front.

I shall vote for this measure, Mr. Chairman, because it is honest; because it carries into effect the pledges of the Republican party made to the people in their hour of need; because it insures integrity on the part of the Government, of private individuals, and of corporations in keeping their obligations; because it insures to soldiers and sailors their pensions, to farmers the price of their products, to merchants the price of their wares, and to the vast army of laborers everywhere payment of their wages in the best money that the world affords. I shall vote for it because I firmly believe that its effect will be to continue the confidence and make more permanent the prosperity which under the present Republican administration of the Government everywhere abounds. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I had contemplated participating in the debate upon House bill No. 1, but an unfortunate or fortunate interview, whichever the case may be, that appeared in one of our Washington papers this week has seemed to cause some degree of alarm among my Democratic friends, and not wishing to embarrass the very genial gentleman who is the leader upon this side of the Chamber, who has been told by other Democrats that they thought the time should belong to those who were more thoroughly in accord respecting the substantial provisions of this measure, I thought to relieve him from all embarrassment by embalming my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where they may sleep in the crypt of this Capitol, in fellowship with the mighty thoughts of the great statesmen of the past who have given them to the world in the same manner. [Laughter.]

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, why my Democratic friends should have been afraid of me. I have been offered by the Republicans time in which to express my opinions, but I can not accept as a Republican courtesy that which I feel as a Democratic member I have a right to demand in my own proper person. [Applause.] I supported every candidate on the Democratic ticket nominated at Chicago, and upon the stump in twenty-seven different States in this Union I maintained the justice of the bimetallic contention. And yet it seems that views now as honestly entertained by me should not be given expression.

I am going to vote against this bill and was going to offer reasons with such power of logic, with such matchless charms of oratory, with such keen satire and invective that I expected to see every Republican abandon his untenable position upon this measure. [Laughter.] Why, over here upon this side of the Chamber, the great majority of us believe, I think, that you on that side are engaged in the task of driving nails in your own coffin, and my friends over here are so desirous that you shall be successful in the accomplishment of that task that I think they fear now—that is the charitable reason which I am giving to myself—they feared that if I gave expression to my opinions the hammer would fall from your nerveless grasp, Mr. Chairman. Therefore I shall avail myself of the privilege, under the rule, of letting my remarks go thundering down the ages in the precincts of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only want to take one minute at this point to say that there is no misunderstanding between my friend from Pennsylvania and myself.

Mr. SIBLEY. Not the slightest.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I offered the gentleman thirty-five minutes' time in which to give expression to his eloquent views. I offered this time in the utmost good faith.

Mr. SIBLEY. I do not desire to question that fact; but what had preceded it was the matter that caused me to determine, after the pressure that had been brought to bear upon my friend, to relieve him entirely from any embarrassment for any position which I am assuming upon this question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Of course I was not aware of what had preceded our conversation between the gentleman and others.

Mr. SIBLEY. Certainly not.

Mr. Chairman, when a candidate for position in this honorable body, I stated to my constituents that upon measures pending in Congress affecting the welfare and happiness of the American people I should exercise, with such intelligence as I might possess, my conscientious sense of duty, regardless of whether the measure originated on one side of the Chamber or the other, honestly entertaining the opinion that on public questions this side of the Chamber can not be unequivocally right nor the other side wholly wrong; nor do I believe that upon questions affecting the prosperity and happiness of such a nation as ours partisan tests should be applied.

My belief is firm in the old adage that "The agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom," and it is to be regretted that a measure so far-reaching in its consequences, so fraught with possibilities for weal or woe to the public, might not have been referred to the proper committee for such minor changes, at least, as would make it more acceptable to the country at large.

The expression of my opinions probably will not reflect the crystallized sentiment of either party in this controversy. Macaulay says: "The effect of violent animosities between parties has always been an indifference to the general welfare and honor of the state." Nevertheless, in the language of Tennyson:

Let Whig and Tory stir their blood,
There must be stormy weather;
But for some true result of good
All parties work together.

The first proposition enunciated in this measure is the permanent adoption of the gold standard. Recognizing as we do the power the majority possess to write their will upon the statute books of the nation, it may well be considered whether, even if the unit of value is to be 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, the hour is yet ripe for this nation to make such declaration.

We have seen the reputed statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that he hopes in the near future to be able to refund the interest-bearing obligations of the United States on a 2 per cent basis. This is a consummation eagerly to be desired, and no action taken by this body should so embarrass him as to render his task, if not impossible, at least more difficult of accomplishment.

In a message submitted to this body by President Cleveland during the Fifty-third Congress, in which he stated his determination to issue $62,400,000 of bonds, he said that if Congress would consent to write the word "gold" instead of "coin" in the bonds the bidders for the bonds would give $16,000,000 more for them. In other words, the international money magnates of the world placed their own estimate upon the difference in value between a bond payable in coin and one payable in gold. At that time, as I thought, the House wisely refused to change the terms of the bond. This difference in valuation was not a chance guess; it was not the theoretic deduction of some academician, but it was the calculating estimate of the best informed financiers of this round world.

We are now asked voluntarily to contribute to them not upon sixty-two millions of bonds alone, but upon $1,046,000,000, the difference in value between bonds reading payable in coin and bonds by their terms reading payable in gold. The estimate made by the world's financiers upon the difference in value of gold or coin bonds of the par value of $62,000,000 was sixteen millions, or about 25.92 per cent, which valuation, if extended to the total issue of interest-bearing bonds now outstanding, would mean an enhancement of value to the holders of such obligations of more than $260,000,000; while the lower rate of interest upon some bonds and short term of others would make this estimate too large, yet the indirect enhancement in values will probably exceed $100,000,000.

We may well inquire what necessity of such paramount importance impels our action in advance of negotiations entered into by the Secretary of the Treasury in attempting to refund these obligations at a rate of interest wherein the United States shall save in interest charges upward of $10,000,000 per annum. An offer made by responsible parties, and submitted to Congress by President Cleveland, affords each member of this body opportunity unerringly to estimate the value of the voluntary surrender which we are called upon to make. What present or prospective crisis dims the financial horizon demanding this change?

You tell us that we already have the gold standard. Under the interpretation of recent Secretaries of the Treasury this is unquestionably true, and has been for years; and I deliberately state my individual conviction that, for some years at least, it will remain the standard. Upon the floor of this House and upon the platform in many States of this Union I proclaimed my belief that the success of the adherents to the yellow metal in the Presidential contest of 1896 would leave in its train business paralysis, commercial stagnation, financial disaster, and all the horrors which accompany falling prices.

We accepted the doctrines of Aristotle, Locke, Adam Smith, Francis Wayland, John Stuart Mill, and every teacher upon financial economics from the dawn of history until this question became a burning issue in partisan politics, that a diminution in the volume of money meant a diminution in the value of products and all the attendant evil accompanying falling prices, and that an increase in the volume of money meant rising prices, with the stimulus to industry and enterprise which is the invariable accompaniment thereof. We championed the cause of silver, not because of any special affection for the white metal, but because we believed that the stock of gold was insufficient; that the foundations of a single metal were too narrow to afford industry and commercial genius to erect thereon grand temples commemorating successful achievement.

Standing here to-day, I affirm that the truth of the essential contention of the bimetalists has been vindicated and is justified in the industrial activity and the increasing range of prices as marked by the system of index numbers, finding its expression not alone in the United States but throughout the extent of the entire globe. Truly, my Republican friends, there have been but few showers in recent years finding you without umbrellas. That beneficent Providence which is said to be the especial protector of "children, drunkards, and the feeble-minded" has also been very kind indeed to our friends of that party represented upon the other side of the Chamber.

The discoveries of the Klondike, the development of Cripple Creek, the perfection of the cyanide process, which has enabled successful operations upon the gold reefs of Africa, have so augmented the production of gold that last year the world produced more than three hundred millions of that metal, more of gold alone added to the world's stock of money than had ever been added of both gold and silver in any one year since the history of man was first written. Responsive to the law laid down by Aristotle and accepted and advocated by the friends of bimetalism, following this great increase of the world's stock of money, prices have risen, hope has again been enkindled in the human heart, commerce sought new fields, and industry and energy find substantial recompense.

For more than a quarter of a century, from the very hour when the crime against humanity was enacted, destroying the money value of one of the precious metals, commercial disaster has trodden upon the heels of commercial disaster. The system of index numbers has shown steadily each year a diminution in the value of the products of labor, whether in factory or upon farm. But I believe that the depths of the valley of humiliation have been reached, that its ford has been crossed, and that now we are scaling the heights of the farther side and that for twenty-five years to come there will be an era of prosperity and development such as the world has never witnessed in the past.

Friends of mine who have visited the "Rand" inform me that those reefs, stretching unbrokenly from Johannesburg on the south, way up to Pretoria on the north, have unlimited possibilities of production, and that the settlement of the lamentable difficulties now existing between the English and the Boers (which can result, I believe, in but one way) will open to development that entire reef, which has been limited by President Kruger to the southern portion only. I am informed that one firm in Chicago has upon its books to-day, waiting alone the cessation of hostilities, orders amounting to more than $3,000,000 for mining machinery for South Africa.

Thousands of American miners are also waiting the close of hostilities to engage in the exploitation of this reef, which, with modern methods of treatment, renders it less hazardous than any mining enterprise heretofore known.

The opinion has been given me by those who are not optimistic in business matters that the product of gold from this reef is likely to reach from three to four hundred millions of dollars annually, and that the world's present stock of gold will be more than doubled within the next ten years.

From Peru, in the heart of the Andean range, come authentic reports of discoveries of gold of such tremendous magnitude and value as the world has never heretofore known, ore in strong veins running in value from four thousand into the hundreds of thousands of dollars per ton.

Following the automatic theory of money, gold will fall, or, as we may properly say, prices will rise relative thereto. Mr. Chairman, the outlook for production of gold is such that I would fain warn my friends on the other side to act with deliberation, prudence, and caution, for it would not be surprising, if the estimates of the possibilities of gold production in the future should be true, that the nations of the world will again be invited to a conference, as they were in 1854, following the discoveries in California and Australia, to consider the desirability of taking away the legal tender of gold, as did Holland and every state now comprising the present German Empire.

Within a few years, possibly, the battle of the standards will again rage, and we shall hear the white metal lauded as the money necessary to the common transactions of life and of such universal adaptation and free from so many objections to gold as currency that it will be called the poor man's money, and some gentleman may be found advocating the cause of silver, not because of its intrinsic value, but because of its scarceness relative to gold.

In 1896 bimetalism was the issue. From the platform my views were stated with all sincerity that we were then fighting one of the world's decisive battles; that we were submitting at the bar of public opinion the merits of the bimetallic cause, and that if then lost it was lost forever. Viewing the magnificent prosperity of the nation to-day, for one I can "rejoice with them that do rejoice," even if I can not obey the command to "weep with them that weep," if any such there be.

The future status of silver as money, in my opinion, will not be determined by the result of some great political campaign, but rather by the concurrent consent of the world's industrial and commercial enterprises.

While I believe that violent fluctuations in value are less liable with two metals than with one, nevertheless I am constrained to the opinion that silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 is not and can not again be an issue of overshadowing importance. Events which have followed, due to the wisdom of no political party, have so changed conditions that a cause that was sacred in 1896 may be ridiculous in some later year.

No man who advocated bimetalism complains of rising prices. It was with that end in view, it was for the farmers, the artisans, and the wage-earners of this nation that we made the contest. We advocated bimetalism and the cause of silver and assured the people that following its adoption prices would rise and the products of labor command higher recompense. We cared not what the color of the metal might be which should measure the products of toil. We demanded alone that in volume it should be sufficient to measure the entire capacity of industry engaged in useful production.

And whether this bill shall pass or fail, the enormous development of gold production has so set in motion and will so set in motion all the energies of production and development that capital may safely embark upon new enterprises, that investment will be augmented, and that a man will be justified in incurring indebtedness under an appreciating quantity of money and be entitled to expect substantial returns where, even with the highest degree of judgment under a diminishing volume of money, disaster was ever imminent.

For twenty-five years the farmers of our nation have traveled through the "slough of despond." I believe the burden is soon to fall from their backs, and that the producer of all the world's wealth will again be the king among men and an independent sovereign in his own homestead. The area of tillable land throughout the world to-day is substantially occupied. With increasing population and commercial expansion, agricultural production must stir itself to keep pace with increasing demand.

To some features of this bill I can yield my most cordial assent. I believe that the permission to issue bank notes to the par value of bonds deposited should be accorded. I believe the tax upon circulation should be removed, and that the banks' proportion of taxation for the protection which they should enjoy should be placed upon capital and surplus, and that nothing may hinder an outflow to the people of a volume of representative money equal to the demand of an ever increasing and expanding commerce. I also deem the provision for banks with $25,000 capital for small towns beneficent in its tendencies. My approval, however, can not be given to that feature which makes every dollar of both paper and silver a certificate of indebtedness against the United States Government.

I have introduced and at the proper time shall attempt to secure recognition for and approval of a bill the merits of which within my time I shall briefly outline, entitled "A bill to provide a safe and elastic currency, automatically expanding and contracting as the business needs of the nation may demand." In different form this bill has been before presented to Congress—in the Fifty-second Congress, I believe—by my learned friend from Tennessee [Mr. Cox], and heretofore objection has been made that while there may be an outflowing currency from the Treasury in time of crisis, there would not be an inflowing currency when money might be so redundant as to provoke hazardous and perilous speculation. Permit me to read the text of the bill, which, doubtless, in its phraseology and form may be much improved upon:

Be it enacted, etc., That any holder of United States bonds may deposit the same in the Treasury or any subtreasury of the United States, receiving therefor 80 per cent of the face of such bonds. The Treasury notes so issued shall be receivable for public and private dues under the provisions of law now applied to national currency issued by national banks of the United States. During the time of deposit of such bonds all interest thereupon shall cease, or be covered into the United States Treasury. Upon the presentation of the Treasury certificate of deposit, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, together with payment of Treasury notes equal in amount to the sum advanced by the Treasury upon such bonds, the owner of the bonds may withdraw them and again convert the same to his own use.

Some four weeks since the Secretary of the Treasury advertised to purchase twenty-five millions of bonds. For this action he has in some quarters been sharply criticized. It is, however, the opinion of men well informed, and whose opinion I share, that by this action alone was a monetary panic averted in the city of New York. Panics are like conflagrations—they grow upon that on which they feed. It may occur in some future crisis that the Treasury will not be in condition to purchase bonds, or that the price which the Treasurer may fix may be below their market value. Under the provisions of such an act as I have outlined, additional value is given to every bond outstanding in the United States.

There are outstanding bonds of the United States amounting to more than $800,000,000 in excess of those pledged to secure the circulation of national banks. These are held throughout various portions of the United States by banks and private individuals. Whenever a monetary stringency occurs the holders of those bonds, upon depositing them, may draw out 80 per cent of their face value in Treasury notes. The relief to be afforded would not be confined alone to New York or the great money centers, but would be a relief extended to every portion of the United States where a local crisis or demand might arise.

The Government would be the gainer in the cessation of interest upon all deposited bonds, and the commercial world relieved from the threat of financial disaster, a foundation for the currency so broad and so secure that there will be required no introduction of the schemes similar to those originated by John Law to afford an abundant and elastic currency.

The owner of the bonds forfeits his interest upon his bonds and draws out his money only when the demand for money would make, and at the face value of the bonds would in industry yield, more than the interest upon the bonds at their par value. When the demand for money slackens the money flows back to the Treasury, and the regulation of the outgoing and incoming current follows the natural and legitimate demands of business alone.

This plan has been submitted by me to many men eminent in financial affairs, and while it has not commanded an expression of approval from all yet none have been able to state an objection of any character whatsoever or to give a reason or hazard an opinion that such a bill would fail to provide a currency solid at its base and elastic and automatic in its operations.

Mr. Chairman, many years ago Hume, the historian, wrote:

A state is never greater than when all its superfluous hands are employed in the service of the public.

Viewing the magnificent prosperity which to-day abounds, seeing the commercial instinct and genius of America engaged in the peaceable conquest of the markets of the world; beholding every American furnace stack blazing, every forge glowing, with every loom clicking, and every spindle humming; urgent drafts upon the treasure stored in our mines of coal, iron, lead, copper, and all the precious metals to supply a constantly increasing demand; noting the marked increase in price received by the producers of petroleum, cotton, wool, and other products of the soil, which has lifted the burden of care and enkindled hope in tens of thousands of homes; witnessing the exports of the products of American factories and American workingmen progressing by leaps and bounds until they reached more than $339,000,000 last year; with our revenues, even in the presence of extraordinary expenditures for suppression of a revolt in our newly acquired possessions, promising to yield a substantial surplus; witnessing every locomotive and every car taxed to its limit, and every vessel laden to the Plimsoll mark to carry our products to market; a prosperity not bounded by parallels of latitude, by mountain range, or sea; reading only last week of voluntary advance of 10 per cent in the wages of 20,000 operatives in the woolen industry, and reading of these advances every week in all branches of industry for the last two years; viewing a condition where each man who has a day's work for sale finds within the reach of his arm a ready purchaser for that day's work at the highest price ever known in history; witnessing every man in the enjoyment of the God-given right to eat his own bread in the sweat of his own brow; retaining the most vivid recollections of the soup houses maintained to prevent the starvation of strong and willing American manhood, and for the support of which many of us were called upon to contribute. I, for one, have no pride of political opinion which I will place as a barrier to impede the triumphal march of the present order of affairs. With American homes bathed in the golden sunshine of prosperity my partisanship shrivels, as it ought, and my patriotism exults, as it should.

To my mind, every proposition in restraint of legitimate trade, every measure which in its tendencies may carry covert threat to our industries, every new scheme of dreamers and theorists, should be carefully weighed by members on both sides of this chamber who aim to be statesmen rather than mere politicians; not to make records for an impending Presidential contest, with which we may appeal to the prejudices or partiality of blind partisans, but with wise conservatism weighing, assaying, and analyzing all measures, and when in doubt let us rather stand still than rush headlong into untrodden paths.

Whatever our views political may be, love of country is not bounded by lines of party. The man or set of men who for political success would drag the car of progress which has emerged from the miasmatic lowlands back into the dismal swamp of despair is a worthy member of no party. I do not think there is such a one on this side of the Chamber. If there be such a one on either side of this body, may we all providentially escape from his leadership.

Mr. Chairman, I have thus, in a desultory manner, stated some of my objections to the pending measure and have trespassed upon the time of this body with statements of my personal views, not because I have deemed an apology necessary for my views in the past or my position in the present. Each Representative in Congress must answer to his own constituency and to his own conscience as to his individual and representative duty.

If there be those who deem my position to-day inconsistent with views which I have heretofore expressed upon the floor of this House, I glory in that inconsistency which permits me to set aside the useful implement of yesterday because the development of the genius of the present affords me a better implement ready for my use to-day.

And so long as I may be honored with a seat in this body and during the term for which I am elected to serve in public life, and in my retirement, so long as life is spared, I shall believe with the poet that—

New occasions teach new duties;
Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must onward still, and upward,
Who would keep abreast of Truth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DALY] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time in four years that the party to which I belong has had a representation in this Chamber from my State. There are two of us here now; and if conditions continue as they are on the other side, there will be eight of us here at the next election. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Action such as that now pending upon a measure that has not received the sanction of a House committee, I assume, has never before been attempted except by the Republican party. It is a bad and vicious practice, and I do not wonder at the criticism of the minority when they arraign the Republican party for this unseemly haste in forcing this measure without that preparation so important a measure justly merits. Months of time have been given the Republican party for preparation, due to the appointment last February of a caucus monetary committee. On the opening of Congress this bill was framed, and every member of the majority was in possession of a prepared statement in explanation of its features.

The debate upon this measure has assumed many phases, but in reality the bill itself proposes absolutely to put in force a single gold standard. The doctrine of monometallism is modern; it is in direct conflict with our Constitution, and it is the first time in the history of our country that it has ever been suggested on the floor of Congress. No one has ever dared to stand for such a radical measure. The great minds of the country believed in the principles of the double standard. Many differed as to the principle to be applied in fixing the ratio, some believing that Congress had the arbitrary right, and others that Congress should regulate it by the laws of commerce and trade. The double standard was born of the minds of Jefferson and Hamilton, who paved the way for our country's greatness, and it is a part of our country's system that should forever remain.

This is evidenced by the fact that through every stage of our advancement and the many changes of party the Constitution has remained inviolate; gold and silver have been and are the money of the country. This is also evidenced by the protest made by the many distinguished statesmen who, when they discovered the demonetization of silver by the act of 1873, protested most strongly against it, and declared their ignorance of the passage of an act that caused that demonetization. Mr. Blaine declared on the 15th day of February, 1878, that he did not know anything that was in the bill at all, and Mr. ALLISON, of Iowa, declared the bill was doctored.

Mr. Burchard, of Illinois, declared that, "unaccompanied by a report, unknown to members of Congress, who, without opposition, allowed it to pass," and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, "It was not discussed, as shown by the record." I might quote the expressions and sentiments of others in this same line, but enough has been said to impress the mind with the belief that the great leaders of the Republican party were opposed to the striking down of silver as a standard of value. Both political parties declared against a single standard when they solemnly pledged themselves to the use of gold and silver in their platforms. The Republican party in 1888 declared as follows:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

In 1892 it declared:

The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetalism, and the Republican party demands the use of gold and silver as money with such restrictions and with such provisions.

In 1896 it declared:

We are opposed to the free coinage of silver except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such an agreement can be made, etc.

In the Republican Campaign Book of 1896, issued by the national and Congressional committees, this proposition was declared:

Of the three measures, i. e., gold monometallism, silver monometallism, and bimetalism, the large majority of the people of the United States unquestionably favor bimetalism. It is the middle-ground between the ultra-faction element, as well as historical and constitutional ground.

Mr. GAINES. What book are you reading from?

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. From the Campaign Book of 1896, issued by the Congressional and Republican campaign committee of that year.

With declarations such as these, and upon which the Republican party has so frequently gone before the people, it will be wondered why this complete change of base. It is but a few years ago when some of the members on this floor declared with all their ability and eloquence against any proposal looking to the striking down of silver as a standard money, and none was more vehement, eloquent, and persuasive than the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me read what he said. The House having under discussion, on the 14th day of February, 1895, joint resolution No. 275, authorizing the issue of $65,116,275 of gold 3 per cent bonds, the distinguished gentleman said:

Fellow-Republicans, let me read to you our platform, the declaration of our principles upon which we have marched to both victory and defeat. In 1888 we said: "The Republican party is in favor of gold and silver as money and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver." In 1892 we said: "The Republican party from tradition and interest favors bimetalism, and the Republican party demands the use of gold and silver as standard money." These are the declarations of our party, and, Mr. Speaker, as one faithful to this platform declaration, I will not vote for this measure.

Again, in criticising the provisions of the bill the distinguished gentleman further said:

You said, "Give us a coin bond and we will let you have the money at 3 per cent; give us a gold bond and we will charge you only 3 per cent. We make a difference of sixteen and a half millions of dollars in a period of thirty years." Why do you do it? We say you do it because in one case our bond would be payable in silver and in the other your bond would be payable in gold, and you get sixteen and one-half millions of dollars in our money for the purpose of compensating you for the difference between gold and silver.

The Republican party refused to sanction the issue of a gold bond and refused to have the policy of the Government changed from the issuing of coin bonds to that of gold. You were in line with the declarations of your party and refused to create a disparagement as against the coin bond. You looked upon it then as of equal merit with that of gold and would not permit the change to be made, as suggested by the banking syndicate of New York. This, too, was at a time when you might have afforded to be generous. Our country was passing through a financial panic such as it had never before experienced. Every industry was crying for help and our country's obligations were threatened with dishonor.

Mr. Cleveland was pleading for money and, in the hope of obtaining the sixty millions or more to meet the emergency, caused the resolution to be introduced for the issue of that amount in gold bonds. Your prostrate country appealed to your sympathies in vain. But you stood, you declared, for the Constitution; you stood for your party's declaration; and in your position you were sustained by your colleagues, Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois and Mr. HEPBURN, of Iowa, and others, aided by that peerless citizen of Nebraska, William Jennings Bryan. What a scene was that, my colleagues! The warrior from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, and the statesman of Nebraska clasping hands in the common cause of preventing the destruction of bimetalism.

How things have changed since then! The Constitution must now be violated! The standard money of the country must be stricken down at the behest of the money changers to pay the obligations connected with Mr. McKinley's election. You know the fountains of wealth—the banks—never failed you during the campaign of 1896, and you ardently hope that they will perform the same duty for the coming campaign if this legislation asked for is placed upon the statute books. You say in answer to the arraignment of my party that we have virtually been on a gold basis for years and that the Republican party declared to the people that as soon as the opportunity offered, it would put the practice into the shape of positive law. This I challenge, and I have no hesitancy in saying that not a member on this floor ever made such a declaration. If he did, or his party ever assumed that position, the party would never have been in control of the Administration of this Government.

One of the reasons urged for the passage of this most unjust measure is that the conditions are favorable and the time opportune for the adoption of the gold standard, based upon the theory that the gold standard has been adopted in Austria-Hungary, Brazil, Great Britain, Chile, Portugal, Sweden, Turkey, Costa Rica, Japan, Peru, Russia, and other European and South American countries; therefore, forsooth, my country must bow to foreign policy. I say to you that I care not if the balance of the civilized world adopted it—the single gold standard. My country is greater, my country is more enlightened, its wants are greater, we are all freemen; therefore we need more money to maintain this glorious position than the unfortunate slaves and pauper labor of monarchical Europe.

If this single gold standard is such a magnificent institution abroad, why do the immigrants flock to our shore. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will tell you. They pay labor on a gold standard, and that is the reason why these immigrants come to this country, glad to partake of the benefits of our institutions and leave behind them forever all remembrance of the poverty and misery they suffered from low wages and the single standard. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

American labor rightfully demands eight hours for a day's work; the American laborer justly asks for higher wages; the American laborer has that ambition and that personality required for good citizenship which makes him desire to surround his family with all the comforts of life and afford education for his children. These can not be obtained under a single gold standard or a contracted currency.

By one sweeping provision the entire bond obligations of this Government are turned into gold bonds, thereby increasing their market value. At no time was it ever legally insisted that the word "coin" carried with it the meaning of gold only. It has ever been contended by leading Republicans that notwithstanding the Government authorities construed them into gold obligations, yet the legal effect and true construction were that the same might be liquidated in silver.

I can not vote for any measure that by legislation will give increased value to the obligation. It was strictly contended by the Republicans that the Democrats by legislation intended to give a value to the silver dollar when we declared the power was in Congress to fix the ratio. It is this thing you are now doing that you charged upon the Democratic party when it declared for the proposition of 16 to 1, that it was proposed to fix value by legislation. Such legislation as you now contemplate places at a disadvantage he who earns his bread by his daily toil.

The redemption of the silver dollar and other circulating mediums, as this bill proposes, means contraction of the currency. Call it by what name you please, or you may designate it by the name of the "issue and redemption fund," yet it means that the money circulating in the channels of trade can be and will be retired by the redemption process and forever impounded and locked up, and thereby place us all at the mercy of the national banks. It means that the national banks will have every debtor at their mercy. It means that the national banks can raise the measure of discount to such an arbitrary standard that the struggling merchant must sooner or later go to the wall, and, on the other hand, the favored ones may keep on adding to their revenues. It is a bank trust, and it holds our business industries at their mercy.

Our Republican friends are boasting of prosperity, and boasting, too, that in a large measure it came through the policy pursued by the Republican party. This claim we deny. We say to you that if it is true, then it is dangerous to attempt to change or make innovation upon the existing laws relating to our monetary system which produced these results. Three hundred and thirty-seven million have been added to the circulation without the aid of legislation. This has in a great degree produced these prosperous times. Why should we now contract our currency? If this increased amount of money has increased the per capita circulation from $21 to $24, then why reduce to the old figures? If our industries are thriving and labor is well paid, why provide the means of destroying those conditions, which this bill will most assuredly do? Rather let our object be in time of plenty to prepare for famine.

The proposition to make every dollar of our currency redeemable in gold has never before been advanced in this country, nor in any other. Why, then, coin silver at all? A Treasury note or gold certificate would perform the same service in the channels of business. If we are to strike down silver, as this bill proposes, we might as well make the destruction complete, for it will have no value as a circulating medium.

You will give the Secretary of the Treasury unlimited power to issue bonds, and at the same time give the national banks power to force bond issues. The Republican party condemned the Cleveland Administration for this same policy, as also did in reality the Democratic party. But if Mr. Cleveland's Administration was dictated by his banking friends, the same friends and the Cleveland allies combined to bring about the election of Mr. McKinley. This bill is their reward.

The unfairness of the pending measure is again apparent in the proposed method of taxing banks. They are to be taxed upon the basis of their capital and surplus. This is but an experiment against a tried policy which has prevailed since the inception of national banks; is a virtual reduction of their tax. Furthermore, why tax the surplus? That is a tax upon the people's money, as the surplus stands as the security of those who deposit.

While the absolute fixing of the ratio between gold and silver at 16 to 1 may not appear to me to be practicable, owing to the now changing conditions and to the power of the banks, there are few who will not agree with me that the money of the country could best stand upon a bimetallic basis.

But the Government is transferring the control of the money supply to the banks, notwithstanding the fact that the issuance of money is distinctly a Federal function, and the Government can not, in justice to the whole people, delegate that power to individuals.

The responsibility now rests upon the Republican party, and they must stand or fall upon the success or failure of this plan. I am opposed to this bill, not because of the question of ratio between the money metals, but because it leaves us at the mercy of unscrupulous financiers, strikes down bimetalism, and will not prevent contraction when a critical time arrives. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, those of us who were here at the beginning of the extra session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, which convened on the 15th day of March, 1897, can see the similarity of the action of the majority of the present Congress and that one in forcing a party measure through the House over the protest of the minority and without regard to the time or manner in which it comes before the House. At the extra session of the last Congress the Dingley tariff bill was before the House, and at that time there sat in this Hall 153 new members, possibly not one of whom had ever read a clause of that bill, and yet the measure was forced through the House by the Republican majority without giving adequate time for its proper discussion.

But, Mr. Chairman, that bill was referred to the proper committee and duly reported to the House, while here at the beginning of the present session we have this measure presented to the House, affecting to a far greater extent the interests of the American people than did the Dingley tariff bill, and its passage demanded by the majority without its having been referred to any committee for deliberation and action, as the rules of the House require. I know, Mr. Chairman, that nothing that can be said on this side of the House will alter or change the determination of the majority on this floor to carry into effect their caucus edict and pass this bill. I recognize this fact fully, but duty to ourselves, as well as to those who sent us here, impels many of us to register our objection and not only vote against the measure, but give some of our reasons why such a departure from the financial system which has heretofore served the American people should not receive the sanction of the American Congress.

Mr. Chairman, during the discussion of this bill some strange things have been said on the floor of the House. I do not see the gentleman in his seat to-day, but I think it was the day before yesterday the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] made a statement that was absolutely astounding, at least to my ears. He declared in his dulcet tones—and we all love to listen to the gentleman, for he always speaks interestingly and charmingly on any subject he discusses—he declared that it was known to the people of the United States that we had been on the single gold standard since 1834.

Such a statement, Mr. Chairman, coming from such a source, I am unable to harmonize with the facts as they exist, for certainly no one knows better than does the distinguished gentleman that from the date of the first coinage laws of this country, in 1793, down to 1873, a period of about eighty years, this country enjoyed the blessings of bimetalism; gold and silver went concurrently to the mints, and were received and coined there at the ratio fixed and established by law, first at 15 and afterwards at 16 to 1; and,

Mr. Chairman, I submit to the House to-day that from the dawn of civilization to this good moment the history of the world shows no people who ever prospered and grew as did the American people the first eighty years of our national life.

We have no way of judging the future except by looking to the past, and, judged by that standard, Mr. Chairman, I ask if bimetalism served the purposes of this Government and the people so well during the first eighty years of the nation's life, why would it not in the future continue to answer every demand? Only a few moments ago the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] stated that no great government, no enlightened country—I believe were his exact words—had ever yet adopted bimetalism. That was another strange assertion to make on the floor of the American Congress, in view of the facts of history, doubtless well known to the gentleman who made the assertion.

Considerable merriment was caused yesterday by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN]. He stated that the Democratic party had crossed itself so often on the money question if a Democrat should walk around the block and meet himself on the other side he would not know which one of the boys he was. [Laughter.] I thought then the gentleman was rather unfortunate in the illustration sought to be drawn. It occurred to me that if the distinguished member from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], entertaining the opinion they once held and that which they now hold on the money question, should meet themselves around a block, possibly there would be no nod of recognition [laughter], and I am quite sure, Mr. Chairman, if the distinguished occupant of the White House, President McKinley, should go around the block and meet that other gentleman with whom he used to be on terms of familiarity, Congressman McKinley, there would be no nod of recognition [loud laughter], for Congressman McKinley was a bimetalist and the friend of silver, while we all know President McKinley is a gold monometallist and is unfriendly to silver.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, the leaders of the Republican party, in Congress and out of it, have crossed themselves as often on the money question as any Democrat may have done, but I suppose they reconcile this change of opinion with the thought that "wise men often change their opinions and fools never do." Who are the wise and who are the foolish on this question I will not assume to say. Mr. Chairman, this bill, in my judgment, is vicious from start to finish. The very first declaration it contains fixes irrevocably and for all time to come the single gold standard on the American people. The Republican party in their national platform adopted at St. Louis in 1896 declared in favor of international bimetalism, and, Mr. Chairman, I submit to the House if that declaration was honestly made, then the majority on the floor of this House to-day are not sincere in their determination to pass this bill and the converse of this is equally true.

If the majority of this House are sincere and honestly believe the provisions of this bill are best for the interests of the American people, then the Republican party was not sincere and deceived and misled the people when they declared for bimetalism in any way, international or otherwise. Supplemented to this, Mr. Chairman, is the further fact, well known to all, that the gentlemen sent to Europe by the President in 1897 in the interests of international bimetalism were hampered and possibly defeated in their purposes by the actions and outspoken declarations of the Secretary of the Treasury in favor of the single gold standard and his advocacy of a measure similar to the one now under discussion. It was impossible to make the people of Europe believe that those in authority honestly wanted bimetalism while the Secretary of the Treasury, voicing no doubt the policy of the Administration, was publicly declaring his hostility to everything except the single gold standard.

The second section of this bill, Mr. Chairman, to my mind, is possibly worse than any other section in it. It provides for the payment of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in gold coin, and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be paid in gold. Every bond now outstanding against this Government and every other obligation to pay money is payable in coin; that is, in either gold or silver, at the option of the Government. The bondholders in this country and in Europe have been at work since the close of the civil war to have these obligations paid in gold, and at last they have found a Republican House, Senate, and President ready and willing to grant their inequitable and illegal demands.

The gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. OVERSTREET] stated that this change from coin to gold in the payment of Government obligations would not benefit the holders of such obligations. If this be true, why have these holders for years and years been demanding this change? No one is here who will say that the great producing and laboring masses of the American people have ever advocated or desired that gold should be substituted for coin in these obligations. Why, Mr. Chairman, during the Administration of Mr. Cleveland, while there was pending a proposition to sell Government bonds—$82,000,000, I think—a strong effort was made to have them made payable in gold, and the reason was urged that these bonds would sell for $16,000,000 more if the word "gold" were substituted for "coin."

Congress refused to sanction the change, and, sir, in the face of these facts, we have members here who voted against this change and are now favoring it, and who declare with apparent frankness and candor that the bondholders will derive no benefits from the proposed change. The total interest-bearing debt of the United States is $1,046,048,750. If the gain suggested in the sale of these bonds while Cleveland was President be correct, then it will be readily seen that the bondholders pocket the snug sum of about $261,000,000 by way of enhanced value of the interest-bearing debt of the Government, caused by changing the word "coin" for "gold;" and, Mr. Chairman, who pays this $261,000,000 into the pockets of the bondholders? We all know that Government bonds are exempt from all taxation, national, State, and municipal; therefore they contribute nothing. It falls on the shoulders of that class whose voice is rarely heard pressing their claims for Government favor—the producing and laboring millions of American citizens. These are they who furnish support and sustenance for the Government in times of peace and who rally in defense of her flag in time of war.

I wish I had the time, Mr. Chairman, to discuss each of the eleven sections of this bill, but I have not. I will, however, call the attention of the House to section 4. This, in my judgment, is dangerous in that it confers on the Secretary of the Treasury the right and authority to issue and sell bonds at his discretion for the purpose of maintaining the redemption fund provided for in section 3 of the bill. I wish, sir, to emphasize my distinct opposition to this feature of the bill. I object to the grant of such authority to anyone, and Congress should never give to any one man, I care not who he may be, the power and authority to saddle untold millions of indebtedness on the people of the United States. These bonds, if issued, are payable in gold at the end of twenty years, and will draw interest at 3 per cent per annum; and, as before said, the limit to the amount to be issued is absolutely discretionary with the Secretary.

Much has been said, Mr. Chairman, by gentlemen about the operation of what is termed the "endless chain" in the Treasury Department. We have heard much about it and read much about it, but I say to the membership of this House to-day that if this bill becomes a law (and I believe it will) this "endless chain" will be transferred from the windows of the paying and receiving clerks in the Treasury to the bond-issuing department, and there the "endless chain" will work, as occasion demands, until there will be riveted around the necks of the American people a bonded debt such as has been seldom borne by any nation.

The eighth section gives unheard-of privileges to national banks and enlarges their powers so that they may be able to either contract or expand the currency at their own will and pleasure, as it may be profitable for them to do.

It is suggested by gentlemen that under the provisions of this bill national banks could issue their notes to the full extent of the bonds deposited and that this would result in a much larger circulating medium. Experience shows that when times are easy bank circulation expands and when money is stringent the reverse is the case.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, the issuance of money, whether of gold, silver, or paper, is the special function of the Government, and the authority to give to the people a safe, sound, and stable currency should never be delegated to any bank, national, State, or private.

A careful reading of this bill by anyone who is disposed to consider it on its merits will convince him that the effect of its enactment will be to reduce the circulating medium of the country, thereby contracting the circulation now outstanding.

Mr. Chairman, with one exception, no political party has ever yet declared in favor of the single gold standard, and the Gold Democrats who did so declare in 1896 only carried one small precinct in the United States.

I may be mistaken, sir, but I believe a large majority of the people of this country are opposed to the financial system sought to be established by this bill. Some may indulge the hope that the passage of this bill will sound the political death knell of the party responsible for its enactment; but whether these hopes be realized or not, the passage of this measure signalizes the fact that the Republican party has surrendered unconditionally to the money power in this country. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, you fellows on the other side have been talking like you thought that we Democrats were fools, and occasionally one of you, with more brass than brains, says he knows we are. My answer to such a fellow is that he thinks he knows it, but he thinks what Patterson dreamt. Patterson dreamt a lie. [Applause and laughter.]

It is sometimes a case of Hobson's choice as between a fool and a knave, but, whatever else you may be, there is a big gang of your fellows that are not fools, but you think that you can fool the American people. In your speeches you are trying to mix up and muddy the money question and thereby hide the real nature of your acts. I propose to call attention to the hornbook principles and the bed-rock fundamentals upon which the issue really turns—the standard of value. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In order to clearly understand that issue we must first understand what is meant by a standard of value.

There will be other issues, and very vital ones, involved in the campaign of 1900, but the battle royal that will be waged in every State of this Union will be the same that it was in 1896—the battle of the standards. You fellows seem to flatter yourselves that that issue was settled forever in your favor in the election of 1896, but you forget that no question submitted to the ballot is ever settled among the American people until it is settled right. The so-called decision in your favor was not fairly won, and so sure as there is a God of justice who reigns in heaven and rules in the affairs of men on earth, that decision will one day be reversed by an overwhelming majority of the American people.

Truth crushed to earth shall rise again,—
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, smitten, writhes in pain,
And dies amid her worshippers.

In the limited time allotted to me I will discuss the real issue involved in the banker bill now before the House, and that is, the standard of value it proposes to fasten upon the American people.

In order to understand that, we must first understand what is the real meaning and function of the standard of value. Much error has been engendered in financial discussions by confusing the different functions of money and using arguments applicable to money in one function, but utterly without any logical force as applied to it in an entirely separate and distinct function. According to all recognized authorities on political economy money has at least three separate functions: First, as a medium of exchange; second, as a measure of value; third, as a standard of value.

Now let us examine these different functions of money.

What is its function as a medium of exchange?

Simply this: Suppose there was no such thing as money for a medium of exchange and a farmer went to town with chickens, butter, and eggs to trade for sugar, coffee, and calico; what would he have to do to make a trade? He would have to find not only a man who had sugar, coffee, and calico to trade off, but a man who was willing to trade them off for chickens, butter, and eggs, and that might be hard to do; but with money as a medium of exchange the farmer sells his truck for that, and when once he gets that in his hands, he has no trouble in finding a man who will be willing to trade him sugar, coffee, and calico for that.

Now, what is meant by money in its function as a measure of value? Simply this: Suppose there were no money as a measure of values and a farmer wants to trade off a mule. If he meets a man with wheat and he asks him, "What is the value of your mule; what will you take for him?" he would have to figure out his value in wheat, and then he might say, "This is a 60 bushels of wheat mule." He meets another man with corn, and he says, "What will you take for your mule?" It would do no good to tell that fellow it was a 60 bushels of wheat mule, and so he would have to figure out his worth in corn, and so on with every other commodity he might be willing to trade him for; but with money as a measure of value he simply estimates his value in money, and as the owner of the wheat and corn has already done the same thing with reference to his product, each has a common measure of value and understands the other at once.

This brings us to its third and, in this discussion, its most important function—that of a standard of value. This requires a more extended consideration.

The standard of value of any obligation, whether public or private, is that substance or thing which will not only legally discharge the obligation, but the right to demand which, will determine the value of the obligation itself, as compared with other things. Suppose, for instance, an obligation calls for the delivery of so many bushels of wheat; wheat is the standard of value of that contract. Wheat will discharge it, and the worth or value of wheat at any particular time will determine the worth or value of the contract at that time. Now, suppose a whole lot of shrewd fellows with thousands and millions of wheat contracts in their pockets want Government aid to enhance the value of their holdings; how could they do it?

Wheat is a standard article of human food, and when it is unduly scarce or high, poor people can use corn meal for bread. So the shrewd holders of wheat contracts get up an agitation against the use of corn bread as human food. They get a report from a medical commission that the use of corn bread is unwholesome, and that the Government, in the interests of public health, ought to pass a law to forbid its use, and a subservient Congress should be found to pass a law closing the mints against corn as they did closing the mints against the free coinage of silver. Would not such a law enhance the value of every wheat contract in the world and depreciate the value of corn? Such was the precise effect of the Sherman Act of 1873 in closing the mints against silver. You now propose to consummate that base conspiracy against the rights of the plain people of America.

You propose in this bill to say, whatever may have been the law before this time, that hereafter no silver dollar shall be any part of the standard of value, but that gold alone shall be the standard of value of all obligations of the people of these United States. And yet gentlemen stand up here and say that such a law is not in the interest of the bondholders, bankers, and other large holders of Government obligations! You propose to say that these large holders of such obligations shall be absolutely entitled to receive 25.8 grains of standard gold, coined at the Government mints, for each and every dollar called for in the obligations.

The number of such obligations will foot up to many hundred millions of dollars, and the passage of this law will necessarily enormously increase the demand for gold and thereby enormously increase its value, and as an increase in the value of any substance or thing, which is the standard of value of an obligation, necessarily increases the value of such obligation, the passage of this bill will naturally tend to increase the purchasing power of every dollar of paper or representative money based upon the single gold standard, just as surely as an increase in the demand for wheat would naturally tend to increase the value of all contracts based on wheat. Of course, a large increase in the mining output of gold would hold such tendency in check, and if such increase in the gold output is followed by an increase in the volume of circulation, it would naturally tend to raise the general level in the prices of commodities that would have to be exchanged for a currency based on gold.

The great increase in the world's output of gold (amounting now to about $300,000,000, as against about $200,000,000 a few years ago) and the large amount of money put into circulation by the war with Spain and the Philippines explain nearly all the rise in prices not brought about by a diminished supply of certain products or the manipulations of certain trusts and combines to unduly increase the prices of products controlled by them. In other words, the purchasing power or value of money is controlled by the same great law of supply and demand that applies to everything else. The scarcer anything is the harder it is to get, and the harder anything is to get, the more you have to pay in order to obtain it. The most eminent writers on political economy tell us that money is bought and sold the same as other things. You may not call it a sale, but, in substance, that is what it is. A boy brings potatoes to sell. There is a merchant willing to exchange money for potatoes. If potatoes are scarce and money reasonably plentiful, the boy gets more money for his potatoes and the merchant gets less potatoes for his money. If potatoes are reasonably plentiful or money scarce, the boy who sells potatoes and buys money gets less money and the merchant who sells money and buys potatoes gets more potatoes.

These are merely plain and simple principles, Mr. Chairman; but these plain principles constitute the lunacy of the silver lunatics. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You are fond of telling the people that the great law of supply and demand, and not the volume of currency, determines prices. In telling that you tell a half truth, and a half truth is always a lie. Our Gold-Bug friends are always talking about the law of supply and demand as applied to the product of the farmer, but they fail to tell us that that same law applies to money also. It takes four elements to determine prices: First and second, the supply and demand of the particular products; third and fourth, the supply and demand for money that such products have to be exchanged for.

Now, in regard to "silver lunatics," Thomas Jefferson tells us that he was denounced as a madman or a lunatic by the bankers and money sharks in his day. It is curious how history repeats itself. In 1796 Thomas Jefferson was defeated for the Presidency by John Adams, but four years later he ran against the same man, and in the year 1800 Thomas Jefferson was elected President of these United States. History may repeat itself in the year 1900, and then William J. Bryan will be the President of these United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The fundamental difference between the Democratic and Republican policies on the standard of value is that the Democrats want to allow debtors in all obligations, public or private, their old common-law right of paying their obligations in either gold, silver, or paper money, based upon the bimetallic standard established by our forefathers in 1792, and which was the supreme law of the land from 1792 to the passage of the Sherman Act of 1873.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TERRY. I understood that I was to have five minutes more.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes. Mr. TERRY. If an annual mining output of three hundred millions of gold will advance prosperity in a country on the single gold standard, how much greater would be that prosperity from an output of five hundred millions of gold and silver combined in a country using both gold and silver as its standard value?

The Republican policy is to narrow the base of primary money and the Democratic policy is to broaden it. The Republican policy is in the interest of the money classes. The Democratic policy is in the interest of the toiling masses, who produce the wealth and constitute the bone and sinew of the country, who pay its taxes and uphold the honor of its flag. No man can safely predict how long the present large output in gold will continue, and whenever it begins to fall off, all of your much boasted jackdaw McKinley prosperity will pass away, and, like an "insubstantial pageant faded, leave not a wrack behind."

The introduction and passage of this bill will mark the final and absolute surrender of the Republican party leaders to the gold syndicate and money power that poured out its millions of corruption fund to make McKinley President in 1896. You propose to abdicate national functions in favor of national banks, to surrender to private corporations the power to control the volume of the money supply of all this land.

With this power of the national banks to control the volume of the country's currency, they can expand or contract it at will. When they want to inflate the values of properties or securities owned or controlled by them or their friends, they can expand it and dispose of what they want to sell at the top of a boom, and then contract it and gather in what they want to buy at the bottom of a collapse. They can thus, by alternate expansions and contractions, absolutely control and dominate the property interests of the entire people of the United States and make themselves their masters.

This was clearly pointed out by John C. Calhoun in a speech delivered by him in the United States Senate in 1833. To confer such powers upon national banks is a base surrender of the rights of the people, and should forever damn any set of men or political party responsible for it.

In this bill you are giving away the very birthright of national government for the mess of pottage you got from the election of 1896; and a miserable mess it was, if we may judge from the way in which your Administration has been truckling to the spirit of English toadyism—yielding to un-American influences and turning its back upon many of the most cherished principles and traditions of the great American people.

What has England, the head center of the gold syndicate, been engaged in? She tried to grab the gold fields from Venezuela, and finally, through the decision of a high joint commission, got the lion's share of what she coveted. She has now cast her covetous eyes on the gold fields of Alaska, and even while her colonial secretary is prating about the beauties of an Anglo-American alliance, she is strengthening her military posts on this continent, and has her guns all trained toward us from Vancouver to Quebec.

She is also grabbing for the gold fields of Africa, and, to exploit her gold syndicate, is waging against the gallant Boers the most unjust and un-Christian war ever waged by one Christian people against another—against the gallant Boers battling for liberty in the Transvaal. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In fighting the passage of this bill we stand where Jefferson stood, when he warned his countrymen against the money sharks in the dawn of the present century. We stand where Jackson stood, when he fought the United States Bank in his day. We stand where Lincoln stood when he uttered his solemn warning to the American people to beware of the insidious and rapid growth of the corporation and banking power and the bondholder trust, whose vast influence now overshadows all the land. We stand where the true, the brave, and earnest-hearted of this land have always stood in every crisis of its history, and, God helping us, we intend to stand there [applause] and to continue and keep up that fight until the janizaries of corporate greed and monopolistic power are driven from the field and the plain people of the land shall plant the glorious symbol of their triumph upon the Dome of this Capitol, with every star radiant in the light of national victory! [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL] is recognized.

Mr. BALL. For how much time?

Mr. RICHARDSON. How much time remains of this hour?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, the fact that so many members of this House on the Republican side of the Chamber find it necessary, in order to give their support to this bill, to recant the professions, if not of a lifetime, at least for the term of their public service, neither commends the bill to my support nor prompts me to oppose it. Three years ago every Republican upon the stump declared it was not their purpose either to abandon silver as money of ultimate redemption, to retire the greenbacks from circulation, or permanently fasten the gold standard on our country.

They then proposed to hold on to the gold standard until foreign governments would help them to turn it loose. Upon a declaration in 1896 for international bimetalism they carried the country and won this House by more than 50 majority. Suspicion as to their good faith, although they refrained from passing a measure like this through the Fifty-fifth Congress, caused by the experience of the bimetallic commission and the utterances of the Secretary of the Treasury, reduced the Republican majority in this Congress to 13, notwithstanding a war was in progress when the elections were held, a condition which always redounds to the good of the party in power.

Why the necessity of now pressing this extreme measure? The Senate is safely against the free coinage of silver, and no bill to change existing conditions in the interest of silver can become a law; and if such a bill could be passed, it would not meet the approval of the President unless he should again change his mind upon the money question. The truth is, the Republican party having never declared in favor of either the retirement of the greenbacks or the permanent adoption of the gold standard, that the great agencies organized to plunder the people and which now own and control the policies of the Republican party are not willing to trust you to go back to your people for instructions, but now demand the pound of flesh, and, unlike Shylock, they are willing to take it even though it draws the blood of the people.

It appears to-day that the Republican party, which brought in this bill, has made an ignominious surrender to the money power by reporting a measure which no political party ever declared for, unless you dignify as such the silver from the Democratic party in 1896, which polled 135,000 votes in the United States.

I am not surprised at the change of front within three years by the Republican party upon the money question. Less than a year ago not one of you, from the President down, could or would tell how he stood on the question of the forcible annexation of the Philippine Archipelago without the consent of its people. On the contrary, to-day hardly a dissent exists upon that side of the aisle from a policy which the President declared at the outset "could not be tolerated and as contrary to our code of morals." Nay, more, you are seeking only a convenient pretext to take Cuba, in the face of our plighted faith to that unhappy isle and the nations of the earth.

Mr. Chairman, I take no special pleasure in the embarrassment of so great a number of gentlemen upon the other side, caused by former positions and utterances in antagonism to the one which they now occupy. The fact that the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, once found it necessary to embrace the cause of silver in order to secure his election and, as he says, defeat the Greenbackers; that the eloquent gentleman from Iowa, Mr. DOLLIVER, has had his "whirl" at silver and, it is said, was so alarmed at the last Republican national convention that he was afraid a declaration for gold would remove all the able Republican Representatives from Iowa from the public service; that the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. HILL, found himself at the last session of this Congress, when he denied the agency of one Joe Leiter in advancing the price of wheat, attributing his paper profits to shrewdness in foreseeing the application of the law of supply and demand, forced to come down with a dull and sickening thud with his theories when, before his remarks could be revised for the RECORD, Leiter had failed and wheat gone down in one day 60 cents per bushel; that they and others are now convinced that this bill is "a good thing and they ought to push it along," does not weaken the force of my objections to the measure or abate my fears as to its harmful results to the people of our country.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, the only doubt that has arisen in my mind for twenty years as to the advisability of the free coinage of silver has been because so many gentlemen, high up in the councils of the Republican party, have professed at all times a friendliness for silver.

The differences upon great fundamental questions between Democracy and Republicanism is so marked that when I find myself agreed with any considerable number of Republicans, I am at once in doubt as to whether or not the measure about which we are agreed is in the interest of the masses of the people.

The issues upon the money question are now sharply defined, and the Republican majority in this House have not added to the weight of their former arguments, reenforced by an occasional false note upon this side of the Chamber, the sounder of which vainly imagines that he can promote Democratic success and advance Democratic theories of government by supporting Republican measures.

This bill comes here, as I have said, without the indorsement of any great political party, and has never been incorporated into the platform of any party save that of the bolters from the Democratic party who met at Indianapolis in 1896, and whose ticket carried only one precinct in these United States. It is not framed at the instance of any considerable number of the unselfish voters of the land, but is demanded by the selfish interest which put up the money to elect the Republican ticket in 1896 and who now demand that the bread cast by them upon the waters shall be returned an hundredfold and in the "shape of cake." This bill is to be passed in the face of the fact that those Republicans who live near the home of the founder of their party, Mr. Lincoln, and west of there, and who yet retain some longings for the Republicanism of Lincoln, do not in their hearts approve of its provisions, and who know that it is a sacrifice of the money which saved the Union and a complete surrender to that class of gold holders who denied their country upon either side the sacrifice of blood or treasure. Unlike General Grant, who in a memorable campaign cut loose from his base of supplies, the Republican party takes no chances, but stands by its campaign contributors.

The Republican party is to go before the country and urge as an excuse for the surrender of the people's last citadel to the money power that the necessity of this bill has been proven by the prosperity now enjoyed by the country. Upon this frail bark they venture to ship their political fortunes and in this castle of cards they would intrench themselves against the assaults of an outraged and plundered public—upon a fictitious prosperity, which is the outgrowth of exploitations of great combinations of capital made possible under the Dingley law; upon the sale of bonds pretendedly made to carry on war after peace was proclaimed; upon an abnormal balance of trade in our favor and the stimulation of many industries now caused by the necessity of providing for our armies in the field and in forts, but which must be dearly paid for in the end.

Why, sirs, if that be the test, what became of the prosperity and the speculative spirit which laid off every hilltop in historic old Virginia and every prairie in "bleeding Kansas" into future great cities in 1889, 1890, and 1891, and that, too, under the Bland-Allison Act and the Sherman law, which are now denounced as the source of all our financial woes?

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that many articles controlled by trusts have been phenomenally advanced; that pig iron, for instance, which a year ago was worth $7.15 per ton, has more than doubled in value; but, Mr. Chairman, while the exploiters of these great combinations have thus doubled the price, the wages of labor has advanced not over 10 per cent, an advance barely sufficient to compensate for the increase in the cost of living. It is true, labor is more generally employed, but it is also true that it is only given a livelihood as long as employment lasts, with no opportunity to accumulate. It is also true, I believe, that these great combinations of capital known as trusts, if permitted to run their course, will destroy themselves when their inflated values have been wrecked; but it is also true, Mr. Chairman, that the promoters of these gigantic combinations will arise, phoenix-like from their ashes, with ill-gotten gains, fleeced from the small fry taken in for the purpose of plunder. They will add to their already enormous wealth by extravagant salaries and reorganized properties bought in through the agencies of receivers.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the shallowness of the money lenders' argument, which has been taken up by their agents and representatives throughout the country, that the world's increased production of gold has solved the money question and exploded the argument of the friends of silver can be easily refuted. Why, Mr. Chairman, these same gentlemen three years ago were contending that our demand for more money was a senseless clamor; that we had money in plenty, what we needed was confidence; that civilization had passed beyond the use of metal money to any great extent, the business of the country being transacted by the agencies which commercial necessities had provided. Hardly had they recovered from the fright which the splendid campaign of our honored leader, the world's greatest champion of popular rights, Mr. Bryan, had given them, when they were thrown into ecstasies by the discoveries of gold in the Klondike and elsewhere.

Why should they have taken so much joy in new discoveries of gold, and why are we constantly confronted with their arguments now of the wonderful productiveness of African gold fields and the great addition to be made to the world's stock of gold by new processes for mining it, unless they know that their arguments in 1896 that we had money enough were false and our arguments that we needed more primary money true? Do not these same gentlemen know that with all the increase in the world's production of gold and in the midst of the prosperity of which they prate that we were a short time ago upon the verge of a great panic, and that, too, in spite of the fact that millions upon millions of Government money were in the coffers of national banks, which were drawing interest upon Government bonds, interest upon currency issued upon Government bonds, and interest upon Government deposits at the same time? You all know to this gross favoritism was added the payment of unearned interest to the banks upon their bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury and the buying in of Government bonds at $1.11 with only four more years to run at an interest of 5 per cent, which is hardly more than half the interest rates paid by the people who will have to pay the bonds.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to prove that the arguments advanced upon the other side of this House that there has been added to the money in circulation in this country more than $300,000,000 in the past three years is not due to an increased production of gold in the world. The greatest quantity of gold ever produced of which we have any statistics was in the year 1898, being $287,428,600. On January 1, 1898, the world's stock of gold available for coinage was $1,594,900,000. On January 1, 1899, the world's stock of gold available for coinage was $1,631,700,000. Thus we see that while the world produced, in round numbers, $287,000,000 in 1898 that not quite $37,000,000 was added to the world's stock of gold money during that year, and, Mr. Chairman, it is true for a long series of years that by far the larger volume of gold produced has not become available for money. It is also true that as men become more and more fabulously rich, as under unjust laws they are now doing, that more and more will it be demonstrated that gold is the rich man's money, and more and more will it be diverted to the purposes of ornament and other uses than that of money.

From whence, then, did our increased volume of money come within the past three years? The answer is easy. From the sale of bonds and the abnormal balance of trade in our favor, caused principally by disasters to agriculture across the waters. In round numbers, for the past three years the balance of trade in our favor has been $1,400,000,000. Thus, from the proceeds of war bonds, signed with the blood of our gallant soldiers and sailors, and the value of our farm products, enhanced by famine in foreign lands, we have added in three years $300,000,000 to our circulation, but it has required the sale of $200,000,000 in bonds and the selling of $1,400,000,000 more of our products than we bought to obtain it. Reverse these conditions; impound the greenbacks, as this bill proposes; destroy the legal-tender value of all forms of money except gold, as this bill does; make our obligations, public and private, payable in gold, as does this monstrosity, then let a shortage occur in our agricultural products and the industrial interests be tied up by a great protest from organized labor denied its share of prosperity! Let Europe demand our gold, and see then how this mushroom prosperity will vanish!

The presence of this bill here, advocated by a majority of the misrepresentatives of the American people, has convinced me more than ever of the necessity of an American money policy for America. It has convinced me more than ever that the national banking interests, which are behind this bill, are a menace to good government. Those of us who declared in the campaign of 1896 and prior thereto that there was no middle ground between "independent unlimited coinage of gold and silver and the issue of all paper money by the Government" and the "adoption of the single gold standard, the abandonment of silver as money, and the surrender of the exclusive power of issuing paper money to the banking corporations" were hooted at. To-day our prophecies have come to pass, and we are not left as "one crying in the wilderness," as is the gentleman from Iowa, who says that every prophecy he has ever uttered in regard to silver has come to nought, and who was comforted because that distinguished apostle of the gold standard, Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, was in the same boat. We have this advantage, that the advocates of free coinage of silver prophesied at the time that their prophecies would fail.

When the Bland-Allison law was passed it was a compromise made with pretended friendliness to silver, as a substitute for a free-coinage bill presented by that great exponent of the silver cause, whose vision was never obscured by selfish interests, who looked alone to the good of the people, whose memory is revered by all true Americans, Richard P. Bland. The Sherman bullion-purchase law was passed as a makeshift and a substitute for a free-coinage bill without the support of a single real friend of silver or a Democratic vote. The trouble with those measures was that by law we discriminated in favor of gold as against silver and pronounced the one metal as more worthy of trust than the other; that we allowed the silversmiths to fix the value of a money metal instead of fixing by law its value.

Had we then said to the world, "Ninety-five per cent of our business is domestic as against 5 per cent foreign; we will not sacrifice the convenience and interest of 95 per cent to 5 per cent; we have sufficient gold and silver planted in our own soil by the 'Giver of every good and perfect gift' to provide us with an independent and ample supply of primary money to keep pace with our business and population, and we will not sacrifice that advantage that foreign consumers may loan us more money, draw from us greater rates of interest, and buy our products at a far less value"—had we given both metals equality before the law; had we said then, as we should we say now; that if all the gold and silver in the world was coined into money and their use abandoned for every other purpose they would not supply the legitimate demand for money, but that paper money and evidences of debt would still be resorted to as is recognized by this bill, and that this great Government of ours, growing nearly one-third of all the products grown by man, manufacturing about one-third of all the articles made by man, and possessed of about one-third the banking capital of the world, with a balance of trade of $600,000,000 in our favor per annum, could and can compel the nations of the earth to pay us in the money we demand, and to take 16 pounds of silver as the equal of 1 pound of gold, or go out of business with those nations now using more than $3,000,000,000 in silver as full legal-tender money.

Only a day or two ago the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] exhorted us to stand by gold because we did $1,500,000,000 in business with gold-standard countries, as against $400,000,000 with silver-standard countries, and yet the party to which that gentleman belongs is to-day afraid to send a message of sympathy across the seas to the brave Boers who are struggling against the oppression of England as we once did, a party which is about to subvert the Declaration of Independence and is now sacrificing the money of the people and the blood of its manhood in an effort to force a government upon the Filipinos without their consent, for the sole purpose of seeking a market in silver-using countries for British and American gold-standard goods.

Mr. Chairman, I am an optimist, not a pessimist. While I believe that this financial measure, the present tariff policy, subservient to trusts and the money power, the policy of "criminal aggression" in extending our dominion over distant islands in defiance of organic law and the advice of the fathers of the Republic, will bring great disaster to the American people and render the problems of free government more difficult, yet I do not despair. I have great confidence in the ultimate action of the American people. Although slow to move at times, they will not surrender the form of government which our forefathers, by superb self-sacrifice and inspired wisdom, established. [Applause.]

The lines are now sharply drawn.

In my judgment, "the people will come into their own again" in the only possible way outside of revolution—that is, by and through that political organization whose birthplace was lighted by the fire of liberty, whose author transcribed in the Declaration of Independence the principles for which it stands; the party of Jefferson, of Madison, of Monroe, of Jackson, and of Bryan; the hope of the people, the friend of mankind—the Democratic party. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

[Mr. McCLEARY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in listening to the golden gems of wisdom and the silvery sparkles of eloquence that have irradiated and illumined this discussion, I have been so strongly reminded of the thrilling days and nights of the campaigns of 1896 and 1898, that, in addressing the House after so many days of debate, I feel compelled to narrate one incident that occurred in my own campaign in the latter year. I remember being met just outside the hall on the evening of one of our meetings by an old and feeble constituent of mine, and as I stopped to congratulate him on his ability to be out, he said: "Congressman, I made up my mind that I would hear your speech to-night if it killed me." [Laughter.]

Now, let me hasten to assure my friends who may have any apprehension as to the result of my remarks this afternoon that my old friend not only survived that speech, but he has been getting better ever since [laughter]; and the chances are 16 to 1 that the reason of his improvement is that on that evening he heard good Republican doctrine, for I had just been nominated on a platform declaring for the establishment by law of the single gold standard, and the meeting was held to ratify that platform.

Considering the way in which our friends on the other side of the Chamber were carried off their feet by the precipitancy with which they were plunged into the discussion of this question, the eloquence, brilliancy, acumen, and inaccuracy of their arguments demonstrate anew their ability to meet any emergency.

The inaccuracy of their statements of historical facts was only paralleled by their ignorance of the Scriptures. I want to suggest to my learned friend from Kentucky that in his version of the parable of the man who went down from Jerusalem to Jericho he does great injustice to the thieves. Let me remind him that it was not the Levite that fell among the thieves. The thieves had too much discretion to tackle such a cold-blooded proposition; and as the gentleman from Kentucky does injustice to the thieves in his version of the parable, he does injustice to his own intelligence and that of his colleagues in his sweeping and comprehensive denunciation of those who support this measure.

Now if I thought that it was at all necessary to say anything in support of the acknowledged reputation of the Republican side of the House for thorough familiarity with the Scriptures, I should begin my remarks with a text from the book of Ecclesiastes:

He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase: this is also vanity.

In the remarks on the adoption of the rule under which this debate has been held the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] said that it would take more time than we could get on our side of the House to apologize for the opinions of those of our party who had paid the debt to time and mortality. But he said nothing of the indefinite extension of time that would be necessary to permit the gentlemen on that side of the House to apologize for the position on the financial question of the distinguished living and the more distinguished dead of the Democratic party. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The only illustrious Democrat for whom an apology has been made by them is Grover Cleveland, and the tone in which this apology was given leaves some doubt in our minds as to whether our Democratic friends were apologizing for themselves for having made Mr. Cleveland President or apologizing for the Almighty for having made Mr. Cleveland. In my opinion the Lord never made a better Democrat than Grover Cleveland, and the Democrats never made a better man President. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] poured out the vials of his wrath upon the Republican party with a fervor that reminded me of one of the old Hebrew prophets hurling his denunciations from the summit of Ebal or Gerizim upon the chosen people. As he spoke in lonely grandeur from the midst of a disintegrating party his words had a solemn pathos like the voice of one crying in the wilderness.

Now, let the prophet from Missouri derive what comfort he can from the delusion that his denunciations are just, but let him not forget to temper the warmth of his enthusiasm with the reflection that we on this side of the House are still the chosen people—chosen by our fellow-citizens to protect the honor and credit of the nation.

Since the triumph of the Republican party in 1896 this country has enjoyed, under the wise and statesmanlike Administration of President McKinley, a period of widespread commercial activity and extraordinary prosperity. Our Democratic friends are unwilling to attribute any of our national blessings to the triumph of Republican principles, and explain them as the direct gift of Divine Providence. Perhaps we ought only to claim that the Almighty has made use of the Republican party in working out his scheme of beneficence. But who ever heard of the Almighty making any use of the Democratic party for beneficent purposes?

This bill, so far as it relates to the currency, simply places upon the statute books the will of the people registered at the polls in 1896. The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who have the courage to vote for this bill need not fear that they are departing from the principles of their party, for in supporting this measure they are simply returning to the principles of Jefferson and Jackson. And in their independence they are following the example of the founder of their party. It was Jefferson who said:

I never submitted the whole system of my opinions to the creed of any party whatever in religion, philosophy, politics, or any other matter where I was capable of thinking for myself. Such an addiction would be the last degradation of a free and moral agent. If I could not go to heaven but with a party, I would not go there at all.

We may be sure that if Jefferson was unwilling to make his chance of reaching heaven depend upon his allegiance to the Democratic party, he would not, if alive to-day, risk plunging his country into the opposite abyss by advocating the modern, Bryanque doctrines of that party. But with characteristic disregard of the truth, Bryan and his followers lose no opportunity of asserting that in their advocacy of the principles of the Chicago platform they are following faithfully in all the footsteps of Jefferson and Jackson. To one, however, who is at all familiar with the political views of Jefferson and Jackson it is clear that there is not an important principle contained in the Chicago platform or advocated by Mr. Bryan to which these distinguished Democrats were not opposed.

When Mr. Bryan told us in one of his oracular utterances that the Democratic party did not care about ancestry and had no use for pedigrees I was reminded of one of Jefferson's letters to a friend who was about starting for England. The letter closes with this request:

One further favor and I am done—to search the Herald's Office for the arms of my family. I have what I have been told were the family arms, but on what authority I know not. It is possible there may be none. If so, I would, with your assistance, become a purchaser, having Sterne's word for it that a coat of arms may be purchased as cheap as any other coat.

Will some gentleman on the other side, who with Mr. Bryan is following in all the footsteps of the immortal Jefferson, tell us Mr. Bryan's views of this method of proclaiming one's democracy? Will Mr. Bryan, following the example of the illustrious founder of his party, go to London and buy a coat of arms for the purpose of making more apparent the gulf that separates him from the great mass of his countrymen whom he daily insults by calling them the "common people?" Thanks to the Republican party there are now in this country no common people of any race, color, or religion!

This Jeffersonian method of securing a coat of arms has its advantages, because one can select a motto and devices in keeping with one's personal characteristics. Considering the obstinate pertinacity with which Mr. Bryan has reiterated the untruths of history and finance, the Earl Marshal might for an adequate honorarium issue to the irrepressible vocalist of the Platte these arms and motto:

HE BEARETH ARGENT, ON A FIELD SABLE, A DEMI-DONKEY RAMPANT; FROM ITS MOUTH ISSUANT IN FLAMES, 10 TO 1, GULES, AND UNDERNEATH THE WORDS VERBA NON VERA.

The author of the Declaration of Independence had strange views on the benefits to be derived from a connection with Great Britain. As late as the fall of 1775 he wrote to a friend:

I am sincerely one of those who would rather be in dependence on Great Britain, properly limited, than on any other nation on earth, or than on no nation.

And a few days later he wrote:

Believe me, dear sir, there is not in the British Empire a man who more cordially loves a union with Great Britain than I do.

And even after the battle of Bunker Hill, in another letter, he expressed his wish that the conflict might be settled without going any further, and after the surrender of Cornwallis he put himself on record as in favor of an offensive and defensive alliance with Great Britain. How many of you, gentlemen, are following in Jefferson's footsteps in this matter? Do you favor an alliance with Great Britain to-day?

But Mr. Bryan has often said, "Like Thomas Jefferson, we trust the common people." In what way did Thomas Jefferson trust the common people? In his commentaries on the Constitution, written from Paris, he said:

I like the power given the legislature to levy taxes, and for that reason solely approve of the greater House being chosen by the people directly. For I think a House chosen by them will be very illly qualified to legislate for the Union and for foreign nations.

In his draft of the constitution of his own State of Virginia he makes, as the foundation of suffrage, property holding or service in the State militia. How many of you, gentlemen, are following in Jefferson's footsteps in this limitation of the right of suffrage?

But we also hear a great deal from the Chicago platform and from Mr. Bryan in reference to the life tenure of the judiciary. Jefferson expressed himself firmly and decidedly on this point, as he did on every other point of public interest in his day. He said:

The dignity and stability of government in all its branches, the morals of the people, and every blessing of society depend so much upon an upright and skillful administration of justice that the judicial power ought to be distinct from both the legislative and executive and independent of both, so that it may be a check upon both, as both should be checks upon that. The judges, therefore, should always be men of learning and experience in the laws, of exemplary morals, great patience, calmness, and attention; their minds should not be distracted with jarring interests; they should not be dependent upon any man or body of men. To these ends they should hold estates for life in their offices, or, in other words, their commissions should be during good behavior.

How many of you, in supporting the Chicago platform, are following in Jefferson's footsteps in this matter? In his draft of a constitution for Virginia he provides that the higher judges shall be elected for life by the assembly and that all the lower judges, even down to justices of the peace, shall be appointed by the executive for life.

We have also heard from the leader of the Democratic party a great deal of denunciation of the use of the ancient writ of injunction by our courts, and a clause in the Chicago platform is aimed against it. But let us look for a moment at what Jefferson conceived the province of the judiciary under our Federal and State constitutions. He said, in a letter to Madison from Paris:

I like the negative given to the Executive with a third of either House, though I should have liked it better had the judiciary been associated for that purpose or invested with a similar or separate power.

Gentlemen, when you inveigh against the use of the writ of injunction by our courts, how close do you keep to the footsteps of Thomas Jefferson, who went so much further, and believed not only, as you say, in government by injunction, but government by judicial veto?

Again, let us see what the great statesman and founder of the Democratic party had to say about the matter of imposts and direct taxation. In another letter, in commenting upon the Constitution, he says:

There is a great mass of good in it in a very desirable form, but there is also to me a bitter pill or two. Would it not have been better to have assigned to Congress exclusively the article of imposts for Federal purposes and to have left direct taxation exclusively to the States.

Now, if this was such a bitter pill to Thomas Jefferson, what sort of a bolus would he have thought was being forced down his throat in your income-tax law that has been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court?

No, my Democratic friends, you do not believe to-day in any of Jefferson's political views. Many of his ideas were crude, childish, and preposterous and quite in harmony with some of the absurd principles of Bryan and his followers. But his views on maintaining the high character and independence of the judiciary and on coinage and finance commend themselves to all thinking, patriotic men to-day; and if you followed them, as you claim to do, you would vote for this bill. Judged by the ancient creed of the Democratic party you Bryan Democrats have left undone those things which you ought to have done, and you have done those things which you ought not to have done.

Jefferson, at the time of the establishment of our National Government, made a careful and exhaustive study of the questions relating to coinage and currency. In his elaborate notes on coinage he says:

The proportion between the values of gold and silver is a mercantile problem altogether. * * * Just principles will lead us to disregard legal proportions altogether; to inquire into the market price of gold in the several countries with which we shall be principally connected in commerce, and to take an average from them.

And again he says:

Perhaps, we might with safety lean to a proportion somewhat above par for gold, considering our neighborhood and commerce with the sources of the coins, and the tendency which the high price of gold in Spain has, to draw thither all that of their mines, leaving silver principally for our and other markets.

In a note to his outline of the coinage system are these words:

I would still incline to give a little more than the market price for gold because of its superior convenience in transportation.

In his famous letter to Hamilton in reference to this matter he said:

With respect to the dollar, it must be admitted by all the world that there is great uncertainty in the meaning of the term, and therefore all the world will have justified Congress for their first act for removing the uncertainty by declaring what they understood by the term, but the uncertainty once removed exists no longer and I very much doubt a right now to change the value and especially to lessen it. It would lead to a easy mode of paying off their debts. Besides, the party injured by this reduction of the value would have so much to urge in support of the first point of fixation. Should it be thought, however, that Congress may reduce the value of the dollar, I should be for adopting for our unit, instead of the dollar, either 1 ounce of pure silver or 1 ounce of standard silver.

The average ratio of the coinage of gold and silver in the commercial nations of Europe at the time of the establishment of our Mint was 14½ to 1. In accordance with Jefferson's views, in our first coinage we slightly undervalued silver, and the metals were coined at the ratio of 15 to 1. This was done for the purpose of bringing gold to this country and keeping it here. But in the course of a few years the bullion value of the metals had changed to about 15½ to 1. And now we come to Jackson's attitude on the money question. In the early thirties gold was discovered in the southern Alleghanies. Through Jackson's influence the ratio of our coinage was changed in 1834 to 16 to 1, and in 1835 branch mints were established in Charlotte, N. C., and Dahlonega, Ga., restricted by law to "the coinage of gold only."

This undervaluation of silver and the establishment of these mints for the coinage of gold only would be called by Bryan, I suppose, owing to his reverence for the memory of Jackson, the misdemeanor of 1834.

The sound views of Jefferson and Jackson on the money question and the wise legislation with reference to coinage recommended by them were based upon a clear conception of the truth of these two principles: First, that the adaptability of metals for use as money lies in the mercantile value of the metals and that coinage neither adds to nor detracts from that value; second, that two or more metals can only circulate freely as money at the same time when they are coined according to their mercantile ratio of exchange.

The experience of mankind, however, has shown that the ratio of exchange of two substances does not remain the same for any length of time and that when two metals are used concurrently as money the metal that is undervalued in the ratio of coinage will disappear from circulation. If a gold dollar has, as a coin, only the purchasing power of a silver dollar when as a piece of metal it has the power to purchase enough silver to make two dollars, it will not long remain a coin.

If, for example, we should enter upon the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1 while the mercantile ratio of exchange is 35 to 1, all the gold in the country would at once disappear, the purchasing power of the silver dollar would be reduced one-half, all prices would consequently be doubled, while all creditors, annuitants, savings-bank depositors, pensioners, beneficiaries of life-insurance companies, and building associations would find that the money received by them had lost one-half of its purchasing power.

The people of this country in the elections of 1896 and 1898 declared their unbelief in this silver heresy, and this bill simply embodies into law the will of the people.

The most serious feature of this money question is that there is such a great diversity of opinion in regard to the fundamental truths in relation to money. Bryan and his school of political philosophers arrive at certain conclusions by a process of reasoning based upon a system of theorizing which ignores the facts of history. But the money question is preeminently a practical question and should be considered from the standpoint of human experience. Ignoring theories and basing our conclusions on the facts of history, I take these to be the fundamental truths in relation to money:

First. Money is that commodity for which by universal consent the people agree to exchange all other commodities.

Second. The people, not the Government, select the commodity which they wish to use as money.

Third. The functions of Government in relation to money, like the functions of Government in relation to food, begin when the people have selected the commodities which they wish to use as money or food.

Fourth. Government can not give to any commodity a value that has not been given to it by the laws of nature and exchange any more than it can give to food nutritive properties that have not been given to it by the laws of nature.

Fifth. When the people have selected metals for money, the coinage of metals is an attribute but not an obligation of sovereignty.

Sixth. Government can not by coinage or legislation add to any metal a value that has not been given to it by the laws of nature and exchange.

Seventh. Exchanges of commodities for money are always expressly or by implication for a given weight of a given metal.

Eighth. The Government can not compel me to part with the work of my hands or the production of my brain.

Ninth. When I have parted with the work of my hands or the production of my brain and have been promised therefor a given weight of a given metal, and he who has made the promise seeks to pay me in a less weight of the stipulated metal, he is guilty of a crime, and the Government will punish him accordingly.

Tenth. When the Government steps in and compels me to receive a less weight of the stipulated metal, or a different metal, it is guilty of a fraud which requires its sovereignty to carry out.

These, according to my understanding, are the ten fundamental verities in relation to money, and they are as unassailable as the Ten Commandments.

I understand that the Democratic party is endeavoring to accomplish that which, if done by an individual, would be a private crime; if done by the Government, a national fraud.

The fundamental truths in relation to currency are equally simple:

First. All metal tokens, such as the silver, nickel, and copper coins of the United States, and all receipts for money issued or authorized to be issued by the Government for use as money, are currency.

Second. Currency is simply a substitute for money used for convenience in making exchanges.

Third. When a community has different kinds of money and different kinds of currency, it is the duty of the Government to so regulate the character and issue of currency as to make all forms of currency redeemable in the best kind of money.

Fourth. The United States has the good fortune to have but one money—gold—and the misfortune to have nine different kinds of currency.

Fifth. It is the duty of our Government at once to simplify and reform our currency and register in the law of the land the will of the people that all our currency shall be redeemable in the money selected by the people.

In view of these fundamental truths concerning money and currency, I hope to see the time when there will be a uniform system of money in operation throughout the civilized world. This money system should be based upon the unrestricted free coinage of such metals as the people may choose, coined by weight according to the metric system. Such a system can be adopted at any time by any nation without waiting for the cooperation of other countries, for existing contracts and foreign exchanges could be adjusted to such a system more readily than our forefathers adjusted their outstanding contracts under our present system when it was adopted a century ago.

Under this system we would have a universal coinage, the coins of our country being substantially the same as the coins of every other country. Each coin would express on one side its national character and on the other side its universal character. On the obverse of the coin would appear the arms, insignia, and legend of the nation that issued it, and on the reverse would appear the simple story of its weight, told in the universal language of the metric system.

Under such a system there would be no silver question, and Bryan's occupation would be gone. All the jargon about 16 to 1, keeping up the ratio, and maintaining the parity would disappear. All the superstition and embarrassment that have surrounded the use of arbitrary and symbolic names, such as guinea, dollar, etc., for describing the given weight of a certain metal, and all uncertainty as to the meaning of these symbolic names would also disappear and our money system would be founded, as it should be, upon eternal truth and mathematical accuracy. With such a money system our currency system would take care of itself.

Until we are ready to reform our system of money and currency along some such lines it is the duty of our National Government, by pledging its credit and by all other honorable means, to give to all forms of money and currency the same ratio of exchange and purchasing power. This bill tends to accomplish this end. It is a step in the right direction. It conforms to the views of Jefferson, Hamilton, Morris, Jackson, and all our practical statesmen, economists, and financiers. The strongest argument in its favor is that it is utterly opposed to the theories of Bryan and his school of repudiationists.

I trust that there are many gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who will support this measure. Let me strengthen their resolutions with the noble words of the great founder of their party:

The honest payment of our debts and sacred preservation of the public faith form the bright constellation which has gone before us and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reform; the wisdom of our sages and the blood of our heroes have been devoted to their attainment; they should be the creed of our political faith, the text of our civic instruction, the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust, and should we wander from them in moments of error or alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety.

Will you follow the bright constellation that guided the steps of the immortal Jefferson or will you stagger after the ignis fatuus that rose from the marshes of the Platte and for over three years has been deluding the credulous portion of the American people?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am in the habit of practicing law for a living at home. In our Kentucky practice we plead to an issue. I have sat here for two or three days trying to ascertain the legal effect and what would be the consequences of the enactment of this proposed bill into law. I have heard a great number of learned discussions in opposition to the Chicago platform, and I have listened carefully to the arguments upon the other side, without having ascertained any definite light as to what would be the effect of the enactment of this bill, so I sent up yesterday to the Comptroller of the Currency and asked him this question:

If all national banks now doing business with a paid-up capital stock of $150,000 or less should be permitted to issue currency to an amount equal to 25 per cent of the capital stock paid in, and all such banks having a paid-up capital stock of over $150,000 should limit their issues of currency to $50,000 to each bank, would the amount of national-bank currency be increased over or decreased under the amount as at present; and if so, how much?

To that question the Comptroller of the Currency sent me this answer yesterday (and that is precisely what this bill proposes to do):

In reply to your inquiry of the 12th instant, you are respectfully advised that if the national banks with a capital stock of $150,000 or less were permitted to issue a circulation to the amount of 25 per cent of their capital, and those with a capital stock exceeding $150,000 were permitted to issue circulation to the amount of $50,000 each, the total issuable circulation would be $97,388,800. The outstanding circulation of the national banks on September 7, 1899, was $300,345,567. Under the plan suggested the circulation of the banks would be reduced to the extent of $102,956,758.

It has been repeatedly announced upon the other side that one of the purposes of this bill is to enlarge the circulation of the national banks. This is ostensibly one of the purposes, because this bill provides that the currency may be increased to par instead of only 90 per cent, as now. But that ostensible purpose is more than counterbalanced by the fact that by this bill the circulation is confined to the par value of the bonds, and the decreased amount of the bonds by the terms of this bill will necessarily curtail the circulation of the national-bank currency $102,000,000.

I propounded yesterday to the Comptroller of the Currency this further question:

Suppose that all national banks having a paid-up capital stock of $150,000 or less should limit their currency to a sum equal to one-fourth of the amount of the capital stock paid in, and that all banks having a paid-up capital stock of more than $150,000 should limit the currency to $50,000 to each bank; and suppose all the present laws relating to the taxation of national banks should be repealed excepting the act of July 13, 1898, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," and that in lieu of all the statutes so repealed there should be substituted a tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent per annum upon the value of the franchises of all these banks as measured by the aggregate amount of their capital surplus and undivided profits, would the total amount of taxes to be collected by the Government from these institutions be increased over or decreased under the amount now collected; and if so, to what amount?

And that, too, is another provision of this bill.

To that question the Comptroller sends me this answer:

For the year ended July 1, 1898, the national banks paid an internal-revenue tax on their capital and surplus of $1,752,802. During the year ended June 30, 1899, the tax collected on national-bank circulation by the Treasurer of the United States was $1,991,753, making the total taxes paid to the Government on capital, surplus, and circulation $3,744,555. With the repeal of the tax on circulation, continuing the tax imposed by the war-revenue act of 1898, and placing an additional tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent on the capital, surplus, and undivided profits of the national banks, the Government would derive from this combined tax on the franchise of the banks $2,700,000, a reduction of $1,035,455 from the amount paid under existing laws, as shown by the latest returns.

So that, Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes necessarily to reduce the circulation of the national banks more than $100,000,000 and proposes to decrease the amount of taxes collectible from these institutions more than a million dollars per annum, and yet what I would like to hear would be an address from the other side contradicting these figures. I want somebody to say to this committee whether the enactment of the bill into a law will bring these results. We contend that the issue of the Chicago platform is not before this committee. For my part, whenever that question comes up, I shall have no hesitancy in standing up and advocating every principle in it.

There is no issue before the committee as to the single gold standard or the wisdom of the Chicago platform. And yet day after day we have had addresses devoted exhaustively to those questions. The question before the committee is, Shall the Federal statutes remain as they are—shall the law continue in force as it is—or shall we introduce this new statute, this new proposition, that has never been advocated upon this floor by any statesman from the foundation of the Government? No man that ever occupied the White House, from Washington to William McKinley, ever advocated such a measure as this. I undertake to say that the gentlemen on the other side are shouting into the wrong tree. We are not here upon this side now to advocate 16 to 1. They say that we are upon the single gold standard. They say that every dollar is equal to a gold dollar, and these propositions are not denied. The truth is that this Government never saw a dollar that was worth less than 100 cents to a dollar unless its legal-tender function was curtailed. The Spanish milled dollars, the Mexican dollars, the paper dollars, the silver dollars—all kinds of dollars—have been worth 100 cents in all our national history for more than one hundred years unless they have been deprived of their legal-tender function.

This bill finds no excuse and can not be justified, whether you favor the free coinage of silver or stand for the gold standard.

If you favor the single gold standard, you say that you are already on that standard, and have been since 1873, and that all the obligations of the Government are being paid in that metal when demanded. Then how will the passage of this bill change either the law or the practice? No; this bill does continue the gold standard, but it is not introduced here for that reason.

It does more than that; it reduces the circulation of the banks in their interest more than $100,000,000, as I have shown from the figures furnished by the Comptroller of the Currency. It reduces the amount of annual taxes more than a million dollars to be paid by these banks. It jeopardizes the security of depositors by reducing to $50,000 the maximum amount of bonds required to be deposited by any of these institutions. It is unfair to the smaller national banks, by requiring them to keep on deposit a larger proportionate amount of bonds than is required of the larger and stronger banks.

If you argue that you want the bill because you want the single gold standard, then you have already answered that argument by stating that we are already on the gold standard and that all of the obligations of the Government are being paid in gold. If you argue that you want the bill because you want an elastic currency, the answer is that private corporations, organized for private gain, should not be intrusted with this enormous power any more than the railroad corporations should be given the power of making elastic freight rates. Private greed would tempt both classes of these corporations to contract when the masses of our people would want them to expand and to expand always at the wrong time for them. But an elastic currency is the very thing this bill is careful to prevent. In section 8 elasticity is carefully guarded against in this language:

Provided, That the amounts of such circulating notes issued to any national banking association having on deposit United States bonds to secure circulation at the passage of this act, or which may hereafter deposit such bonds to secure circulation, shall not exceed in any case the par value of the bonds deposited as herein provided.

Now, it is "herein provided" that the bonds to be kept on deposit even by the largest and strongest bank need not exceed $50,000; and it is "herein provided" that the currency issued shall not exceed the par value of the bonds. We see by the Comptroller's figures that although currency may be issued up to the par value of the bonds to be deposited by the terms of this bill, still the amount of currency will be reduced more than a million dollars below the amount now in circulation, caused by the still smaller amount of bonds required to be kept on deposit in the Treasury. In other words, currency now required to be issued up to 90 per cent of the par value of the bonds is more than $100,000,000 in excess of the currency allowed by this bill, although to be issued up to the par value of the bonds.

It is well known that these national banks will issue no more currency than the law requires them to. Their profits are made from the deposits and not from the currency issued. So that the national bank with a paid-up capital of $1,000,000 is not required—indeed, it is not permitted—by this bill to issue currency in excess of the amount of $50,000, while the smaller banks are required to issue currency to the amount of 25 per cent of the capital paid in. The bank, therefore, with $150,000 is required to issue notes to the amount of $37,500 and the million-dollar bank to issue money only to the amount of $50,000.

It is, therefore, a truckling to the larger banks and an unwise and unjust discrimination in their favor.

But, again, this bill seeks to exonerate the larger banks from the payment of their just share of taxes. These taxes are now imposed upon the circulation and in proportion to the circulation.

The larger banks under this bill will pay a smaller amount of taxes proportionately than the smaller ones.

For my part, if I believed in the single gold standard and was willing to make silver merely a token money, redeemable in gold, still I would oppose this bill, because we have about $500,000,000 of outstanding silver dollars, and it is a foolish piece of extravagance to keep these silver dollars at all, to be used as token money. If we must have the single gold standard, then sell these silver dollars at 50 cents to the dollar and let the Government realize $250,000,000 for them, to be turned into the Treasury. No man can give any good reason why the Government could not and should not use paper money in lieu of these silver dollars, if the silver dollars are to be used only as promises to pay in gold. This new paper money would be as good token money, redeemable in gold, as you propose to make the silver. This new paper money would have behind it the same pledge, just as you say silver has, and why board this silver as a mere sentiment? So, I say, the logical conclusion from your major premise is to sell the silver dollars as bullion and substitute paper money. Take out of circulation everything but gold and the paper redeemable in gold, and the Government would make $250,000,000 by this transaction, and have precisely the same amount and character of money you are proposing to establish.

You Republicans should not claim any credit for the present prosperous condition of the country. The large productions of gold in the Klondike and in South Africa have, it is true, appeared in some measure the demand for more basic money. The war with Spain and in the Philippines, together with that in Africa, have increased the demand for mules, cotton, manufactured articles, and farm produce, and we are having comparatively prosperous times. But these are not of your doing, and unless past experience fails these mines will soon be exhausted. The present good condition proves our contention. We have argued all along for more basic money and for higher prices. We said that with more money would come higher prices, and with higher prices would come better times. Both of these propositions you denied. Now our predictions have been fulfilled, and yet you claim the credit. The truth is that all of the legislation enacted upon the subject of silver was Republican legislation and passed by your party, so that if you are to have credit by the present prosperity of the country, you are to be charged up with the panics of 1873 and of 1893 and the distressing conditions of those periods.

There is a peculiar thing about our bondholders and our money standards. The bondholders had no objection to a fiat money standard at the outset when they were buying the bonds cheap on that account. It was only after the bonds had been sold by the Government that these gentlemen clamored to be paid in coin "in order to strengthen the credit of the Government." Then these bondholders had no objection to the double standard when Mr. Cleveland had bonds for sale. They took coin bonds without objection, and only remarked they would give $16,000,000 more for them if "gold" instead of "coin" was put in them. But the double standard was all right for buying purposes.

Now this bill comes and writes "gold" in these same coin bonds, donates that $16,000,000 to these bondholders, and it is a great outrage to talk about double standards and fiat money now. The Government is on one standard when bonds are to be sold, and always on another standard when bonds are to be paid. Yes, gentlemen, and let me remind you that the same people who were for fiat money and then for the double standard in buying bonds from the Government are the same people who fostered and organized that Indianapolis convention. They are the same people and influences that are thrusting this bill forward and crying "repudiator" at every man who opposes the single gold standard.

But again, this bill greatly increases the amount of gold to be kept locked up in the Treasury in addition to the $100,000,000 of gold reserve now kept. It requires an additional $50,000,000 to be kept on deposit in the fiscal department. Then comes this new feature:

There shall be transferred from the general fund in the Treasury of the United States and taken up on the books of said division, as a redemption fund, the amount of gold coin and bullion held against outstanding gold certificates, the amount of United States notes held against outstanding currency certificates, the amount of silver dollars held against outstanding silver certificates, the amount of silver dollars and silver bullion held against outstanding Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, and an amount of gold coin and bullion to constitute a reserve fund equal to 25 per cent of the amount both of United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, outstanding.

Thus we see that by contracting the national-bank circulation and by this new redemption department substantially all the money of the country may be impounded in the Treasury by this bill except gold and the subsidiary silver coins. The silver dollars may again be paid out, it is true, but only as token money redeemable in gold, and this silver will take the place of paper which is to be permanently retired, and as such token money will operate as the same endless chain to drive out the gold that is admittedly the worst feature of the present system.

No, gentlemen, this bill does provide for the perpetuation of the single gold standard, but it does more. It is a bankers' bill which conflicts with the declarations of both the great political parties.

It originated at a popular watering place on the Atlantic, without consulting the common people, and they do not want it.

All of the talk which I have heard for years on this floor and elsewhere about the commercial value of gold and silver, independent of the prices fixed by the demands for purpose of coinage, is to my mind little short of nonsense. The law of supply and demand applies to silver as well as to anything else; and when you destroy the chief demand for silver and expect the price to remain unchanged, you are talking very unwisely. There can be no commercial or commodity value ascertained for either metal until all the countries of the world cease using both of them for coinage into money or until all the world begins the coinage of both of them at the same ratio. All of the troubles we have had in our past history in keeping the two metals together was not caused by differences in the prices of the metals as commodities, but because of the different prices offered by different countries at the same time for these metals for coinage purposes.

At one time France paid a larger price for our silver than we were paying, and the silver went there and left us nothing but gold. At another time France paid a larger price for our gold than we were paying, and the gold went there and left us nothing but silver. So with other countries. The metal that left us always went to be coined into money and not as an article of commerce. The demand for the metals for the purpose of being coined into money has (coupled with the supply) in all the ages and countries of the world regulated their value. By money I mean money and not mere tokens or promises to pay money. You certainly have not forgotten the trade dollar, which had more silver in it than the standard silver dollar and yet, not being a legal tender, was worth only its bullion value.

You certainly can go up to the other end of the Avenue and find a Mexican dollar with more silver in it than there is in one of our standard silver dollars and find it passing for much less.

No; it is not because of the pledge of the Government behind the silver dollar to keep it up. No such pledge was ever made until 1890, by the Sherman law, and silver had remained at par for seventeen years after the gold standard was established in 1873. No; it was not because of the small number of silver dollars in circulation prior to the Sherman law. France keeps to-day $800,000,000 of silver on a par with gold simply by paying all of her obligations in either metal at the option of the Government and by making both of them full legal tender.

This country, with twice the population and business, could keep half that amount of silver at par too, and in the same way.

But the national banks do not want us to do it, and hence this bill is introduced. Thus step by step the work has been done.

First. The sale of the bonds at low prices and payable in any lawful money.

Second. A change in the contract making the interest payable in coin.

Third. The destruction of the silver dollar, and leaving no coin but gold.

Fourth. The sale of other bonds as coin bonds and for $16,000,000 less than could be had for gold bonds. Now we are asked to not only write gold instead of coin in all the bonds, but we are asked to allow the national banks to contract the currency more than a hundred millions and to relieve them from the payment of more than a million dollars annually in taxes. Every one of these steps was an outrage upon the people. Have not these national banks been favored enough? They are already enjoying privileges not enjoyed by State banks, and this bill still further extends and enlarges these privileges so that the State banks will hardly be able to compete with them for business. From whatever standpoint this bill is looked at it is wholly useless and wholly pernicious.

The natural tendency of the nations anyhow is to concentrate wealth and power into the hands of the few and to leave the millions poor and dependent. Legislation ought to be directed so as to counteract this natural tendency as far as practicable. Instead of doing that you have, by protective-tariff duties and special legislation, fostered many a trust and made many a millionaire at the expense of the people. This bill will make the national banks the greatest trust of them all. You are shutting your eyes to all the warnings of history. The banks of Europe control the movements of the armies and navies of the Old World. And if this bill fulfills the promises made by its promoters, if it brings an elastic currency and gives these banks full power to contract and expand the currency as they choose, if this bill gives the Secretary of the Treasury full power to issue gold bonds whenever and in such amounts as he pleases, then indeed we will have come to the very gates of a monarchy. So let the martial music strike up and the bugle call to glory and to empire be sounded.

With the empire shall be needed this favored money class and a gilded aristocracy. But with the empire will come also a larger standing army, larger tax rates, and the people must furnish the soldiers and pay the taxes. I stand here to enter my protest against this bill and warn you that its enactment will serve to hasten that evil day that sooner or later has always come to every country in every age; that evil day when the masses of the people have become paupers and slaves, crouching at the feet of a throne. It is the same old story, written upon the tombs and attested by the moldering monuments of antiquity. All of the freedom that mankind has ever known has been surrendered and lost by yielding to the same temptation. The glitter of the empire soon disappears when the citizen has lost his liberty. The owl comes to hoot in the banquet hall when the king and his guests have departed, and the lizard comes and crawls over the broken columns and crumbled art that for a time ornamented the royal pageant. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted me for the discussion of this matter I shall first endeavor to give a clear and concise explanation of the most important provisions in the measure.

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL.

By section 1 the gold dollar, consisting of 25.8 grains standard gold, is made the unit of value. By sections 2 and 4 all interest-bearing obligations of the Government, the United States notes, the Sherman Treasury notes, all obligations, public and private, for the payment of money, and at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury any other kind of money, are made payable and redeemable in gold. In brief, by the terms of this bill gold is made the only money of final redemption and the sole measurement of values.

The motive that induced its authors to provide, in the fourth section, "and all silver certificates presented for redemption shall be redeemed in accordance with existing laws," is known to themselves only. It would be a reflection upon their intelligence to assume that they were unfamiliar with the facts that the Secretary of the Treasury had time and again said that it was his duty under the law to redeem every silver dollar with gold if demanded by the holder, and yet, giving these gentlemen the benefit of the presumption that they were aware of this, it makes the conclusion irresistible that this language is placed in the bill to mislead and deceive the people.

Section 2 contains this language:

All obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

That is, in section 1.

By this provision an obligation for the payment of a hundred dollars can only be discharged by the payment of that number of dollars, each of which contains the required quantity of gold. And yet by a subsequent provision in the same section it is said:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal tender quality of the silver dollar or of the subsidiary or minor coins or of the paper currency of the United States, or the laws making national bank notes receivable and payable for certain public debts and dues and obligations between national banks.

By this clause it is made sufficient for an obligor to tender silver dollars or United States notes in the payment of such debts. There is a conflict between these provisions which must inevitably produce great confusion and many hardships to both creditors and debtors.

The bill establishes in the Treasury Department a division of issues and redemption, which is charged with the issues, redemptions, and exchange of the various kinds of United States money permitted or authorized by law. It is made mandatory upon the Treasurer to transfer from the general fund in his Department, first, all gold coin and gold bullion held against gold certificates; second, all United States notes held against currency certificates; third, all silver dollars held against silver certificates; and, fourth, all silver dollars and silver bullion held against Sherman Treasury notes; and these sums, aggregating on the 9th day of December, 1899, $683,454,903, constitute the redemption fund. In addition to this, and to be used for redemption purposes, the Treasurer is required to also transfer to this division gold coin and gold bullion equal in amount to 25 per cent of the United States and Sherman notes, which is to constitute the reserve fund, and will amount at present to $108,865,824.

The redemption fund proper and reserve fund will aggregate, as matters now stand, $792,320,727, not a dollar of which can get into circulation where it can do active service in the commerce of the country except by the withdrawal of a like sum theretofore so engaged.

It is officially stated that the gold coin and bullion in the United States on the 1st day of July, 1899, amounted to $963,498,384. By the terms of the pending bill $289,328,943 of that sum will be imprisoned in the vaults of the Treasury as redemption and reserve funds, leaving $674,169,441 in gold to be used in the payment of Government expenses and in the commerce of the country.

The silver dollars and bullion will be held in the redemption fund; or if not, their paper representative, in silver certificates or Treasury notes, will be impounded in their stead. Under the power vested in him by section 3, to maintain the parity and value of money by the use of gold for the redemption of any other kind of money, the Secretary of the Treasury will, no doubt, retire from circulation every dollar of silver and Government issues of paper money. Taking the latest published reports, there will be, at its organization, placed in this division about five hundred millions of silver dollars and bullion, which includes practically all our silver money exclusive of subsidiary coin. There will likewise be placed in it about $290,000,000 in gold coin and bullion with which to begin the retirement of greenbacks, silver certificates, Sherman notes, and currency certificates.

The Secretary is authorized from time to time to transfer to this division from the general fund any money not otherwise appropriated, or he may exchange funds in this for those in the general division, or he may sell gold bonds of the Government to maintain the reserve fund; but he is forbidden to make a transfer from the general fund which would reduce it below $50,000,000. With this restriction, it may be safely said, in view of our increasing expenditures, that there will seldom be transfers and exchanges will be unheard of; but the issue of gold bonds will be the rule, and the climax of stupidity and folly will have been reached when a great Government like ours shall be found issuing gold bonds for the purpose of reducing the volume of money in circulation.

The bill authorizes the organization of national banks as follows, namely: In cities of the population of 2,000 or less, with a capital of $25,000, by permission of the Secretary of the Treasury; in cities of 6,000 population or less, $50,000 capital; in cities of 50,000 or less, $100,000 capital, and in cities of more than 50,000 population, with a capital not less than $200,000. To secure their circulating notes such banks are required, where the capital does not exceed $150,000, to deposit with the Treasurer of the United States interest-bearing, registered United States bonds to an amount not less than one-fourth the capital, and $50,000 where the capital exceeds $150,000.

Upon the delivery of these bonds such banks are entitled to receive from the Treasurer circulating notes in blank, registered and countersigned as required by law, to the par value of the bonds; but in no event shall such notes be issued to such an association in an amount in excess of the capital stock actually paid in. The limitations placed upon the circulating notes is that they can not exceed the capital stock paid in, and the condition precedent is that the character of bonds must have been deposited for them. It must be entirely plain to every man, even those of puny comprehension, that it is the deliberate purpose of the dominant party in this House to fasten as permanently as can be done by statutory enactment upon the people of the United States the single gold standard, to retire all forms of Government money other than gold, and delegate to the national banks the power to issue and control the volume of paper money hereafter to circulate among our people. To each and every one of these three unsound, unwise, unpatriotic, and vicious propositions I am now and always expect to be opposed. I protest against this scheme to plunder and oppress the plain people of this country in order to make profit for the favored few. This measure ought to be entitled "A bill to aid national banks and enrich the gold trust and bond syndicate by the impoverishment of the people."

OPPOSED TO NATIONAL BANKS.

But the national banks must be cared for by the Republican party, nor must the Grand Old Party forget the bond sharks.

The chief purpose of this bill is to delegate to the national banks the power to issue and privilege to control the entire volume of paper currency in the United States. In the accomplishment of this cruel and wicked design interest-bearing gold bonds to an amount satisfactory to the bond hunters will no doubt be the most active instrumentality. Issue bonds to replenish the gold reserve and then deplete it by the purchase for retirement of greenbacks and other Government paper currency with the gold until the national banks are left without a solitary check upon their merciless manipulations of the circulating medium. It is a conservative estimate that fixes the possible volume of national bank notes at one-third of the circulation, and it is believed will be nearer one-half when this measure shall have been in operation for one or two years. Armed with this high function of government, those in charge of the banks will see that it is so exercised as to bring profit to them, though it plunder the people and dishonor the Government.

The circulation will be contracted or expanded whenever there is a promise of reward to themselves, though it should, "like a thief in the night," steal away the fortunes and happiness of men by the millions. The power to control the volume of circulation carries with it the possibility of striking down fortunes and wrecking homes and can not be safely reposed where avarice will tempt or revenge will inspire its unfaithful execution.

Banks of deposit and discount are a benefaction, but those of issue are a curse to any citizenship. Such institutions are condemned alike by past experience and the teachings of statesmen.

In 1803 Mr. Jefferson wrote Mr. Gallatin:

"This institution (The United States Bank) is one of the most deadly hostilities existing against the principles and form of our Government. * * * Ought we, then, to give further growth to an institution so powerful, so hostile? * * * Now, while we are strong, it is the greatest duty we owe to the safety of our Constitution to bring this powerful enemy to a perfect subordination under its authorities. The first measure would be to reduce them to an equal footing with other banks as to the favors of the Government."

On September 11, 1813, he wrote Mr. Eppes:

"Bank paper must be suppressed and the circulating medium must be restored to the nation, to which it belongs."

Andrew Jackson said:

"If Congress has the right under the Constitution to issue paper money, it was given them to be used by themselves and not to be delegated to individuals or corporations."

In his Thirty Years in the United States Senate Thomas H. Benton says:

"Experience had shown such an institution (United States Bank) to be a political machine adverse to free government, mingling in the elections and legislation of the country, corrupting the press and exercising its influence in the only way known to the money power—by corruption. General Jackson's objections reached both heads of the case—the unconstitutionality of the bank and its inexpediency."

General Jackson, by his indomitable courage and heroic efforts, drove from existence the United States Bank at the termination of its second charter, and from that time to the civil war the Democratic party lost no opportunity to denounce the system. In the national banking act the Republican party substantially revived it, and in the lifetime of these the history of the old bank has at least in some respects been repeated."

By some hidden influence the Secretary of the Treasury was induced upon the close of the war to enter upon the work of retiring the paper circulating as currency, and would have continued this disastrous policy had not the act of January, 1868, prohibited its further enforcement."

Again, subsequent to 1875, under the guise of resumption, this same scheme to aid the national banks was inaugurated, but the act of May 31, 1878, denying the Secretary the right to further retire greenbacks, was passed."

The intents of men are not discernible except as they mature into action; but, tracing these policies to the motives that induced them, as you would the stream to the fountain, you must arrive at the conclusion that they were intended to benefit the national banks of the country. Could the taxpayers of America be made more happy or wealthy by the conversion of a noninterest-bearing currency into interest-bearing bonds? No, gentlemen; the purpose then as now was to endow the national banks with the valuable prerogative conferred by this bill."

But these are not the only instances in which they are reputed to have attempted to bring about favorable action on the part of the Government. Emanating from some one, there was scattered throughout this country in the early spring of 1893, to bankers and capitalists, the following circular letter, viz:

DEAR SIR: The interests of national bankers require immediate financial legislation by Congress. Silver, silver certificates, and Treasury notes must be retired and the national bank notes upon a gold basis made the only money. This will require the authorization of from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 of new bonds as a basis of circulation. You will at once retire one-third of your circulation and call in one-half of your loans. Be careful to make a money stringency felt among your patrons, especially among influential business men. Advocate an extra session of Congress for the repeal of the purchase clause of the Sherman law, and act with the other banks of your city in securing a petition to Congress for its unconditional repeal per accompanying form. Use personal influence with Congressmen, and particularly let your wishes be known to your Senators. The future life of national banks as fixed and safe investments depends upon immediate action, as there is an increasing sentiment in favor of Government legal-tender notes and silver coinage."

Following this, Congress was convened in extraordinary session; a "money stringency" was felt from shore to shore; the "purchase clause" was repealed and Congress requested to authorize the issue of "gold bonds," which it refused. How much these institutions had to do with the origin, prevalence, and atrocity of the panic of 1893 will perhaps never be fully known, but that they contributed in some measure is manifested by the reduction of their circulating notes from 1887 to 1892 in the sum of $96,075,508. They are largely responsible for the endless chain whose first link was wrought by Secretary Foster, as appears from the following telegram:

OCTOBER 1, 1891.

FRANKS PIERCE,
29 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.:

Assistant Treasurer Kennard has been instructed to redeem Treasury notes in gold.

CHAS. FOSTER, Secretary.

And whose circuit was practically completed before the Harrison Administration passed, as appears from the following order, viz:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1893.

SIR: You are hereby authorized and directed to prepare designs for the 3 per cent bonds provided in a Senate amendment to sundry civil bill now pending. The denominations which should first receive attention are 100's and 1,000's of the coupon bonds, and 100's, 1,000's, and 10,000's of the registered bonds. This authority is given in advance of the enactment, in view of pressing contingencies, and you are directed to hasten the preparation of the designs and plates in every possible manner. I enclose a memorandum for your guidance in preparing the script for the body of the bonds."

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES FOSTER, Secretary.

THE CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

How great an influence they may have exerted in securing a reversal of the rulings of Secretary Foster in reference to silver certificates and silver dollars through the following utterances of Carlisle and Gage it is not possible to tell, but that there was a reversal of Foster's position is shown by a letter written by Secretary Gage on November 4, 1897, to Mr. C. F. Taylor, of Philadelphia, Pa., from which I quote as follows:

It may be added that it was officially declared by the late Secretary of the Treasury that "although silver dollars and silver certificates have not up to the present time been received in exchange for gold, yet if the time should ever come when the parity can not otherwise be maintained, such exchange will be made." This would no doubt be the rule of action now if required to maintain the parity. Such a contingency, however, has not yet arisen, and so far as can now be seen is not likely to arise."

Respectfully yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

For these reasons the national-bank features of this bill are seriously objectionable, and in the name of the splendid constituency I represent I not only protest against the extension of the Government's favors to these institutions but appeal for the withdrawal of those they now enjoy."

AGAINST GOLD STANDARD—REPUBLICAN MISCONCEPTION OF VALUE.

To those who have listened to or read the argument of gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber it is glaringly apparent that they are either ignorant or purposely conceal their knowledge of the conditions that give origin to value. They constantly refer to it as an intrinsic quality of the material used for money purposes. For instance, in the course of his remarks the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] said:

"The legal-tender quality adds no value to money, but merely makes provision whereby debts may be discharged by the tender of specific kinds of money, which, being good, the creditor is bound to accept."

In a certain sense this is true, and yet there has not been made upon this floor within recent times a statement more artfully misleading than the one quoted. The Congress alone can make or designate a legal-tender money for this country; and while that does not directly add value, it does, as admitted by him, "make provision whereby debts may be discharged," etc., and this power conferred by law to discharge debts causes people who owe debts, must pay taxes, and effect exchanges to want this money for these purposes. The entire population enters the competitive struggle to obtain every such dollar, and its value rises and falls as the supply and demand for them fluctuate. It creates a demand for such money, and this demand, the supply being limited, creates value in it."

Again, the gentleman, referring to the efforts of the Government to supply the deficiency in money and to cause it to circulate by making it legal tender, says:

"The universal and absolute failure of all such efforts is sufficient evidence that this quality is not a quality of value. There is not a single instance in the history of finance where the legal-tender quality added to the money has enabled it to circulate at a greater value than its intrinsic value where it does not possess equally the pledge and faith of the Government for its full redemption."

The gentleman's memory has grown treacherous and untrustworthy, for I am sure he knows that the so-called trade dollar, containing 420 grains of silver, but not possessing full legal-tender power, fell in value to 80 cents, while the standard silver dollar, containing but 412½ grains of silver, possessing full legal-tender power, kept at a parity with the gold dollar, and that without any pledge on the part of the Government to redeem it in gold."

This occurrence within recent years ought to satisfy the gentlemen on the other side that there is a marked difference between a dollar possessing full legal-tender power and one that does not. It will not be possible for the gentlemen to escape the dilemma by the contention that the Government was pledged to maintain the parity and equal value of the one and not the other, because it has never been hinted that there was any such duty resting upon the Government until the passage of the Sherman law in 1890, and this disparity occurred before that date. Indeed, Secretary Foster, as late as February and December, 1892, held that silver coin and silver certificates were not redeemable in gold, as appears by the following correspondence:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 12th instant, in which you ask whether silver certificates have been redeemed in gold coin; in what amount and on what authority. I have to state in reply thereto that, so far as this office is concerned, it has never been done, nor have any of the subtreasury offices been authorized to do so, and no departmental instructions have been received to that effect."

Respectfully yours,

E. H. NEBEKER,
Treasurer United States.

HON. H. M. TELLER, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, December 7, 1892.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your favor of December 7. I beg to inform you that silver dollars are not, in law or in practice, exchanged for gold or for paper that calls for gold.

Very respectfully,

Hon. H. M. TELLER, United States Senate.

CHARLES FOSTER.

Nothing could more conclusively demonstrate to the thoughtful students of the question a total lack of knowledge of the origin of value than do such expressions as those quoted upon the part of the gentlemen who give utterance to them. The intrinsic qualities of matter can not be destroyed or impaired by the failure to use it; and if value were one of the intrinsic qualities of gold and silver, it could no more be destroyed or changed by ceasing to convert these metals into money or use them as commercial commodity than could their hardness, malleability, and other inherent qualities.

In the commerce of the world there are requisitions for both gold and silver; and if not one ounce of either were employed for monetary use, these metals would still be valuable as articles of commerce, though no one is so stupid as to believe their value would be so great when so restricted in use. Nor does any man entertain the opinion that these metals would have value if there were no use to which they could be applied, for, in such an event, no one would want them and, not wanting them, would give nothing of value in exchange for them. This view, sound in logic, is sanctioned by a long and unbroken line of authorities that have often been cited in and out of this Chamber in the discussion of this question, and to a few of which I now call attention.

Jevons, in the Value of Gold, says:

Value, like utility, is no intrinsic quality of a thing; it is an extrinsic accident or relation.

Again he says:

Value is not a property of anything. It arises wholly out of relations which exist between things.

Francis A. Walker, in his Money and its Relations to Trade and Industry, states as follows:

Money no doubt is the produce of labor, but, as Adam Smith observes, if it would exchange for nothing, it would have no value; so M. Say says that the value of gold and silver consists only in what they will buy.

McLeod says:

There is no such thing as intrinsic value.

If, then, value is not inherent or an intrinsic quality of matter, it follows irrefutably that it must have its origin in extraneous circumstances and conditions, and to deal with a question of such vital importance legislators ought, if they have not heretofore done so, advise themselves most fully as to what these are.

Senator JOHN P. JONES has defined value to be:

Human estimation placed upon desirable objects whose quantity is limited.

And, speaking for myself, I have been unable to detect any error or lack of completeness in this definition. It is sound in reason, supported by the best thought of the ages, and no man has since its utterance appeared upon the arena of public life in this or any other country who has been able to point out any fallacy in it.

It seems to me to be axiomatic, for if there is no desire on the part of anyone for a given thing, it can not be exchanged for another thing of value; while, on the other hand, if the quantity is unlimited, it can not be exchanged for a thing of value, because it can be had without the surrender of such other things. The conclusion is irresistible and unavoidable that the value of money, or anything else whose quantity is limited, depends upon the demand and supply. In logic the truth of this proposition has never been and it is safe to say can never be overthrown. In the history of monetary affairs and commerce it has been established by the occurrences of every day since the world began, and the sooner the lawmakers recognize and accept this fundamental principle the earlier will come the possibility and unflinching hope of the correction of our unsound and unsafe system.

MONEY DEFINED.

Nothing is actual money that does not possess the legal-tender power or needs itself to be redeemed. Hence I define money to be an irredeemable thing, a solvent of debts and medium of exchange. The dollar is the unit in this country of its denominations and this unit is subdivided into fractional parts. All contracts for the payment of money specify the number of units and parts of units to be paid, and must be discharged without reference to the value of the unit at the time of the fulfillment of the obligation. For if a man to-day agrees to pay another $1,000 twenty years hence, there is no judicial tribunal to be found that would not hold the obligor bound when it became due to pay that number of dollars, though it required twice as much of the products of his labor and articles of commerce generally to secure them as he would now have to give in exchange therefor.

The terms of the agreement and the law preclude the consideration of the change in value of the dollar, notwithstanding the resultant effect may have been extremely disastrous to the debtor and profitable to the creditor, or vice versa. Gentlemen upon this floor have seen within their own times friend after friend fall in the struggle with the appreciating dollar and sink beneath its cumulative burdens into hopeless insolvency and utter despair.

As a medium of exchange people look not merely to the dollar, but to the exchangeable or purchasing power of the dollar, and whatever this may at the time happen to be is its value.

There may be those who have never considered it, but it is not conceivable that any human intelligence has ever studied the question and concluded that the value of the dollar, whether of paper, silver, or gold, is fixed and unchanging. Indeed, the fool who will learn in no other way than by "the hard school of experience" knows that it does change as the conditions upon which it is dependent vary. The principal factors in controlling it are the supply and demand, first, of and for dollars, and, secondly, of and for articles of commerce.

Demand for money arises from the natural and artificial wants of mankind, and the functions assigned it by law, and the necessities of trade, and in the aggregate exclusive of that pressing upon it for service in the payment of debts is at any given time equivalent to a very large per cent of human desires for all other things. For, if one want a hoe or a hat, a dress or a diamond, the preliminary wish is for dollars with which it may be had.

The supply of money is fixed by law, either directly, as in cases where the power and discretion to control the quantity to be issued are given to some department of government, or indirectly in the selection of the money material by naming it in the law.

The demand for money is always urgent and, except in times of business depression, increasing, so that it is a matter of the most serious importance that the supply by direction or indirect action resting with the law should be maintained at such relations with the demand for it as will insure a fairly remunerative price for the commodities for which it is exchanged. That the purchasing power of the dollar is not always the same may be shown not only by the infallible rules of logic, but by the declarations of the most learned authors who have written upon this interesting topic.

Aristotle said:

Money by itself * * * has value only by law and not by nature; so that a change of convention between those who use it is sufficient to deprive it of all its value and power to satisfy all our wants.

John Locke, in Considerations, etc., Regarding Money, says:

Mankind having covenanted to put an imaginary value upon gold and silver by reason of their durability, scarcity, and not being very liable to be counterfeited, have made them, by general consent, the common pledges whereby men are assured in exchange for them to receive equally valuable things to those they parted with for any quantity of those metals; by which means it comes to pass that the intrinsic value regard in those metals made the common barter is nothing but the quantity which men give or receive of them, they having as money no other value but as pledges to procure what one wants or desires.

Again, he says:

But if you increase or lessen the quantity of money current in traffic in any place, then the alteration in value is in the money.

David Hume says:

It is not difficult to perceive that it is the total quantity of the money in circulation in any country which determines what portion of that quantity shall exchange for a certain portion of the goods or commodities of that country.

James Mill says:

In whatever degree the quantity of money is increased or diminished, other things maintaining the same, in that same proportion the value of the whole and of every part is reciprocally diminished or increased.

John Stuart Mill says:

The value of money, other things being the same, varies inversely as its quantity, every increase of quantity lowering the value and every diminution raising it in a ratio exactly equivalent.

Ricardo says:

The value of money in any country is determined by the amount existing. * * * That commodities would rise or fall in price in proportion to the increase or diminution of money I assume as a fact incontrovertible.

Says Cernuschi:

The purchasing power of money is in direct proportion to the volume of money existing.

Francis A. Walker states:

The value of money in any country is determined by the amount existing.

Human reason sometimes errs, and it is barely possible, though not probable, that these great scholars, one and all, may have been mistaken either in premise or conclusion. There is yet another evidence, not merely persuasive, but, in my opinion, conclusive, touching this matter, and it is to be found in the history of prices of staple products. If, then, money, whether gold or silver, varies in value, we have not the choice between a unit that does and one that does not vary, but rather a selection between standards, all of which change with the varying conditions that dominate every one of them.

WHY I AM FOR THE BIMETALLIC STANDARD.

If the standard shall be of gold or of silver alone, its measuring capacity will vacillate with every movement of the demand for or supply of it, while if it be made of both I conceive that the supply will be less liable to fluctuate, because when there may be a diminution in the one it may be overcome by an increase in the other metal available for coinage. If this should occur only at rare intervals, it would serve to avert the disturbances, wrecks, and ruins that otherwise would crush thousands of our countrymen.

The prosperity and happiness of our people demand a system that will guarantee a sufficient quantity of basic money, and if in an effort to secure it we should adopt a plan that would, as some appear to apprehend, produce too much, it would be infinitely more easy to cure that defect and protect the country against its evil consequences, if any, than it will be if we establish one that will give too little; in which case irreparable losses, baffling human ingenuity to escape, would be visited upon our fellow-citizens. [Applause.]

I am for the bimetallic standard, not only for these prudential reasons, but because it is neither a new nor unsuccessful experiment in the United States, the opinion of the clamorous recent converts on the other side to the contrary notwithstanding. It was given to our constitutional Government upon the counsel and advice of Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton, the ablest and most profound exponents of their respective schools of political economy in their age and time, if, indeed, not since the foundation of the Republic. It came to us when the love of country and people was at its high tide and before the besom of selfishness had infected our free institutions. It received the sanction of the wisdom and patriotism of all citizens, native and adopted, for more than eighty years of our national life, during which the marvelous and matchless progress of an honest, intelligent, energetic, and unselfish population in material, moral, and mental development challenged the admiration of the civilized world and caused the most advanced nations to shudder for the safety of their laurels. [Applause.]

I know it has been said that because of the changes made by the acts of 1834 and 1837 we have been upon the gold basis since then, and even the act of 1853, which related to the quantity of silver thereafter to be used in the coinage of the subsidiary coin, has been invoked to aid the rudderless arguments of our opponents.

These changes, as everyone in the least familiar with the subject is aware, were made to prevent speculators from shipping our coin to countries which were coining the particular metal at a higher ratio than it was coined by the United States, and, instead of detracting from, fortifies and strengthens our contention that when a government confers the legal-tender power upon money made of any given metal, it produces a desire for it that enhances its value.

The relative value of gold and silver in 1873 has been cited as evidence of the fact that it can not be affected by legislation. This is a most unfortunate citation for our adversaries when the full story is told. At that time France was coining silver at the ratio of 15½ to 1, so that under her law 359.9 grains of that metal could be converted into a coin equal in value to a gold dollar, while in this country we were putting 371½ grains into the silver dollar. Hence ours was by the effect of the French law driven to a premium. Differently stated, it was as follows, viz:

	Ratio.	Value in gold.
371½ grains of silver.....	16 to 1	$1.00
Do.....	15½ to 1	1.0315
1 ounce of silver.....	16 to 1	1.2929
Do.....	15½ to 1	1.3337
United States unit, 371½ grains of silver.....		1.00
French unit, 359.9 grains of silver.....		1.00

But if we had not this satisfactory and convincing experience that attended our course under that standard to guide us now into the pathway of safety and good fortune, there is eminent authority that should be of more than passing influence on the Republican side to support the view that the Constitution—to whose mandates we should ever render a cheerful obedience—forbids the destruction of this ancient system. I may add at this point, and with much pride, that I am in my political affiliation one of that class that holds and teaches that the Constitution should be strictly but fairly construed and, when so construed, observed with an unflinching fidelity. [Applause.]

Hon. Daniel Webster said:

I am clearly of the opinion that gold and silver at ratios fixed by Congress constitute the legal standard of value in this country, and that neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard or to displace this standard.

Hon. James G. Blaine said:

I believe gold and silver coin to be the money of the Constitution. No power was conferred on Congress to declare either metal should not be money. Congress has, in my judgment, no power to demonetize silver any more than to demonetize gold.

But Republicans tell us that this constitutional standard, if adhered to, will flood the country with money. This, if true, would be a cogent reason for a change, but no justification for a violation of the fundamental law. But is it true?

By the official statement issued from the Treasury Department December 1, 1899, it is shown that there has been coined but 482,622,376 standard silver dollars in our entire history, and in the same document the paper currency in the United States on the same date is certified at $1,368,783,987, or nearly three times the sum of silver dollars.

If, in addition to our silver and gold coin, more money to the extent of this enormous amount is required, no sufficient reason has been or can be given, in my opinion, why it should not be supplied in both silver and gold, if possible.

If, then, the Government should undertake, with mints wide open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold, to supplant this volume of paper currency, can any man number the years in which that work shall have been fully completed?

It is no answer to this to say that a paper circulation is more convenient than a metallic one, for wisely enough has it been provided that the holder of gold or silver coin may deposit it in the Treasury and receive gold or silver certificates, according to the coin deposited, in lieu thereof. This is the ancient and abiding doctrine of the Democratic party, the tried and approved principle of a sound finance. [Applause.]

According to the report of the Director of the Mint for 1898, there was then on hand in the principal countries of the world $4,594,900,000 in gold, $3,977,500,000 in silver, and $2,322,800,000 in uncovered paper.

This gold and silver money was the net results of the accumulations of all the countries since the use of these metals for money began, and yet the figures show that they were not sufficient to meet the wants for money by $2,322,800,000. If, beginning its use as money as early as the human race did, there is now but $3,977,500,000 of it, then tell me how far down the line of the centuries to come it will be before this vast fund of uncovered paper money used for the lack of the metals can be substituted by the new acquisitions of silver, and then how much longer till the flood? [Applause.]

The supporters of this measure insist with apparent earnestness that the course of affairs since 1896 has destroyed what they term "the free-silver heresy" and point to advanced prices as indisputable proof. We have in the past and do now contend that not only gold and silver is the money of the Constitution, but that if limited to gold the essential amount of basic money can not be had. The facts are that by importations and productions the gold coin and bullion in the United States were increased from July 1, 1896, to July 1, 1899, in the sum of $363,267,541, if the official reports can be relied upon. This was an increase of 60 per cent in the money of final redemption, and the effect upon prices exemplifies our invincible argument. Of this sum $200,954,193 was secured by net imports of gold coin and bullion, and while it increased our stock it impaired that of other nations, and can not be said to have been an accretion to the common store.

By fiscal years it was as follows, viz:

Year ending June 30—
1897.....	$44,653,200
1898.....	104,868,476
1899.....	51,432,517
Total.....	200,954,193

The balance of $162,313,348 must represent the productions for that time of the mines in the United States, which would be an average annual production of $54,004,449. It is hardly within the scope of well-founded expectations that this high yield should continue through any considerable number of years. The gold product of the United States mines averaged $49,050,000 for the calendar years 1877 and 1878, but for the twenty-four years beginning with 1873 and ending with 1896 the average was only $36,822,833. Still, should our mines maintain this generous flow when proper reductions are made for the part used in the arts and sciences and that necessary to replace the worn, lost, and destroyed coin, it is difficult to see how the necessities that arise from the growth of our population at the rate of nearly three million per annum and expanding commerce are to be met by this product.

My gold-standard friends, if you are anticipating with confidence that this precious metal will continue to rush in upon us from foreign shores, let me admonish you that it is a venture full of danger to chain this country to such a standard upon the assumption—for it can be no more than such—that there will be at least equal additions in the years to come. Confident myself that they do not have the element of certainty to that degree that intelligent men ought to make them the basis of legislation like this, I appeal to the history of the importations of this metal for the years that lie behind us to convince you of the hazard in doing so. The records of your Government—and you ought not to ignore them—show that such acquisitions of gold, like the tides, ebb and flow. The net exports of gold from the United States from June 30, 1864, to June 30, 1877, amounted to $561,639,427; the net imports from June 30, 1877, to June 30, 1888, were $224,192,846; and the net exports from June 30, 1888, to June 30, 1896, reached the sum of $323,628,544.

The net exportations, as stated for the period from 1888 to 1896, almost equals one-third of the gold said to be in the United States now, and assuming that the history of that time may repeat itself, it is apparent that it would be criminal on our part to ignore it and base our actions solely upon the occurrences of the past three years.

REPUBLICANS HAVE CHANGED POSITION.

But, Mr. Chairman, I can not conclude my remarks upon this interesting subject without calling attention to the conduct of your party touching it. The time has been within recent years when your most conspicuous leaders, as well as thousands of the rank and file of your party, were not unmindful of the wisdom and justice of the cause for which we now contend, nor did it discredit their party standing to declare for the system that your party now endeavors to destroy. More than that can be said. The Republican party more than once in national convention plighted its faith and avowed its devotion to the bimetallic standard.

In 1888 the Republican platform said:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

Whatever apologetic explanations may be attempted, this was intended to and did give the American voters to understand that you were then for the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver.

In 1892 the Republican platform, touching this question, read:

The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetalism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions to be determined by legislation as will secure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal, etc.

I omit the part merely commending the efforts to bring about an international conference. If there had been any doubt as to the kind of money referred to in the 1888 resolution, this utterance removed it by announcing that the party was for "both gold and silver as standard money."

Your platform in 1896, so far as the money question is concerned, is fairly and accurately stated in this clause, to wit:

We are therefore opposed to the free coinage of silver, except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such an agreement is obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved.

In 1888 your party was so enthusiastically for free silver that it was not content with the enunciation of its position, but it even arraigned in vigorous terms an alleged Democratic Administration for its animosity toward the white metal.

In the next national council of the party (1893) you thought you were still for the two as "standard money," but having some misgivings, due, no doubt, to the lack of instructions from the masters, you left as an avenue of escape the provision that there should be some safeguards thrown around it by legislation so as to insure the same purchasing power for the dollars of each.

In 1896 the party proclaimed that it was steadfast in the faith, provided other nations could be induced to embrace it; otherwise you were against it. But you pledged your Administration to an honest, faithful missionary service in its behalf. You sent your commissioners to foreign courts, and when objections were being dissipated and the prospects of success were brightening your chief financial officer, a member of the President's official family, began writing letters and giving out interviews to the resident correspondents of the foreign press which made and were intended to make the impression upon the minds of those with whom the commission were treating that the American people were not earnestly for the bimetallic standard. Of this course on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury the President was fully apprised by Senator CHANDLER. Strange indeed it was that the Secretary thus attempted to thwart the execution of an honorable obligation resting upon his party, and especially upon the President, but stranger even than this is the fact that the President, having been thus informed, did not seek to counteract the effects of the Secretary's efforts. He was bound not only by the platform upon which he was elected, but in his letter of acceptance he gave his pledge to enforce it, as follows:

The Republican party has declared in favor of an international agreement, and if elected President it will be my duty to employ all proper means to promote it.

In making his report orally to the Senate of the United States on January 17, 1898, Senator WOLCOTT, who was chairman of the Bimetallic Commission, referred to these matters as follows:

We were also somewhat embarrassed by the statements of representatives of the New York bankers in England, who sought access to English officials and assured them that any sentiment which had formerly existed in the United States in favor of bimetalism was dead: that the commission was sent solely as a sop to a few far Western Republicans; that the country generally favored the gold standard, and that the President of the United States shared this view.

The statements were untrue, of course, but in support of them these people assumed to present interviews and statements of the Director of the Mint, a hold-over from the last Administration, the late Comptroller of the Currency, an equally precious legacy, now out of the public service and translated to a Chicago bank, and pretended statements in letters and interviews from the Secretary of the Treasury to the effect that there was no chance for international or other bimetalism and favoring the permanent adoption of the gold standard. Nobody in Europe cared a rap what the two minor prophets thought or said, as nobody in this country cares, but the alleged statements of the Secretary were a different matter. * * * In my opinion the great majority of the members of the Republican party are bimetalists, and the fact that they are misrepresented by a Cabinet officer is not pleasing but endurable.

The President and his party had evidently concluded to make an open avowal for the gold standard, for within two hours of the time fixed for the final adjournment of the extra session of the Fifty-fifth Congress he sent a special message to that body, transmitting with it a report from the Indianapolis gold convention committee, and said:

I commend this report to the consideration of Congress. * * * This subject should receive the attention of Congress at this special session. It ought not to be postponed until the regular session.

After this, on the 28th of January, 1898, at a reception at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York, in a speech delivered, the President said:

It will not suffice for citizens nowadays to say simply that they are in favor of sound money. That is not enough. The people's purpose must be given the validity of public law.

He now is more bold than then, and in his annual message sent to the present Congress, he says:

While there is now no commercial fright which withdraws gold from the Government, but, on the contrary, such widespread confidence that gold seeks the Treasury demanding paper money in exchange, yet the very situation points to the present as the most fitting time to make adequate provision to insure the continuance of the gold standard and public confidence in the ability and purpose of the Government to meet all its obligations in the money which the civilized world recognizes as the best.

The President has not always entertained this view of the money question. On November 5, 1877, he voted for the Bland free-coinage bill. On February 28, 1878, he voted for the Bland-Allison Act and aided in the passage of that law notwithstanding the President's veto. He was chairman of the committee on platform in the national convention of his party of 1888 and reported the resolution in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money. On June 14, 1890, in this House, he said:

I am for the biggest use of silver in the currency of the country. I would not dishonor it; I would give it credit and honor with gold. I would make no discrimination. I would utilize both metals as money and discredit neither. I want the double standard.

And he is the same William McKinley who, in a speech at Akron, Ohio, in 1891, said of Grover Cleveland:

During all his years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of our precious metals, one of our own great products—discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored, even before his inauguration to office, to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards and to the end of his Administration persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce, and therefore dear.

He would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else—money the master and everything else the servant. He was not thinking of the poor then. He had left their side. He was not standing forth in their defense. Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money; the sponsor and promoter of these professing to stand guard over the poor and lowly. Was there ever more glaring inconsistency or reckless assumption? He believes that poverty is a blessing, to be promoted and encouraged, and that a shrinkage in value of everything but money is a national benediction.

There is in the immediate front of your party in this country a national contest, in which you will have to explain to the American people why your party has undergone such transformation of sentiments since the election of 1896. You may be able to meet the expectations of the people in this direction, but at present I do not see how it will be possible.

CONCLUSION.

But, without further comment upon this phase of the question, I desire to say, in conclusion, that from the hour it became manifest that this country was to be chained to the single gold standard the clouds of distress became darker and thicker about our pathway and the shocks of disaster grew more numerous, terrific, and far-reaching, until the very foundations of our financial institutions seemed as if they were about to crumble into hopeless ruin. Special causes, easily traceable by the student of public affairs and not of enduring character, have temporarily checked the ravages of this vicious system; but when these causes, like the conditions that gave birth to them, have ceased to exist and be operative, as in the vicissitudes of a brief span they will, it is not improbable that the storm of financial disaster will again bear down upon us in all its horrible fury and relentless devastation.

The righteous appeal that we have so lately heard from every section of our common country finds no response in this measure.

Under it the dollar, now too exalted, can never be dethroned, and its purchasing power over the products of farm and mine will certainly not grow less and may reach limits hitherto unknown. Staggering under its blighting effects, from those who delve in mines, those who cultivate and cajole the fields into yielding bountiful harvests, and all the toiling millions will come the mighty cry, until its echoes and reechoes will be heard in every section, even in this capital city, and heeded by a Congress willing to serve the plain people rather than do the bidding of the money trust, the bond syndicates, and the national banks. With a vivid recollection of the sufferings and sacrifices of our fellow-citizens in the past under your gold standard, I again denounce this bill, which can not fail to bring power and fortune to the few, nor likewise miscarry in its mission of peril and desolation to the many. [Applause.]

[Mr. BERRY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no time. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. ATWATER. Mr. Chairman, the limited time allotted to me in this debate will not permit me to make an extended argument upon this great financial question. However, it is not necessary that I should do so, as the question has heretofore been very fully discussed and the great American people have studied this question of bimetalism or monometallism and have already made up their verdict. My own position among the people of my district is too well known to need any affirmance at this time. With the intelligence which always characterizes them in their study of public questions, they have concluded that the success of bimetalism is necessary to the prosperity of the great body of our people. I do not think I am exaggerating the truth when I say that a large majority of the citizens of the United States have reached a similar conclusion. The Republican party have never declared against bimetalism, and when their leaders and speakers have been charged heretofore with favoring the single gold standard as the money of ultimate redemption they have always repudiated the suggestion and claimed that they were bimetalists, provided that this condition could be effected by international agreement.

They have claimed that the United States could not alone put into operation the double standard of gold and silver without the aid and cooperation of the other great powers in the world. The present Administration among its first official acts after it came into power was to appoint a junketing commission to visit the continental powers with the professed purpose of obtaining their consent for the restoration of silver to an equality with gold.

It has transpired in this debate that there is scarcely a prominent Republican member of this House, long in public life, who has not heretofore in the discussions of this question in this Hall unqualifiedly committed himself against the single gold standard; and it is said that there are few more exhaustive or logical arguments in favor of bimetalism than contained in a speech delivered in this House some years ago by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON.

This position of the Republican party and of its distinguished members was either a result of sincere conviction, or was, perhaps, part of a deliberately preconceived plan to deceive the people of this country. Great truths are not intended to be bandied about from year to year, or to be changed, chameleon-like, to suit the whims or fancies of individuals or parties or decades. There are some axioms of finance which appear to have established themselves as firmly as any well-known principle of political economy, and one of these is the theory of bimetalism.

During the fluctuations which have occurred from time to time in the production of the precious metals, during the recurring stages of depression and prosperous times—considering the selfish ambitions of large owners of wealth of the country and the wants and demands of the great mass of the people, considering the conditions of producers and consumers, of the capitalist and of the laborer, of the agriculturists and the manufacturers—the great principle of bimetalism had embodied itself into the financial economics of the world as the best system which could be devised to serve the interest of all classes and to preserve the great principle of equality between the breadwinner and the employer of labor.

The Republican party until to-day has never dared to favor legislation which declared openly and unequivocally against bimetalism. Were it not for this deception which the other side has practiced before the people there would have been an unmistakable majority in this House to-day opposed to this bill. They have practiced a deception upon the people, and they are now proposing to reap the result of this long period of duplicity and double dealing. I am glad that they have thrown off the garb which they have worn so long and that they now appear in their true position upon this question. The gauntlet has been thrown down, and it is for the American people to decide in that great battle which will be waged in 1900 whether this Government shall be administered in the interest of the creditor class who hold our bonds and other evidences of indebtedness or in favor of the interests of the great body of the people who claim that their Government should stand for "equal privileges to all and special privileges to none."

The Republican party in North Carolina has even gone further in its declaration for bimetalism than the national Republican party. They have in their State platform often declared for bimetalism and the restoration of silver, and the few Republicans in this State who have aligned themselves with the national Republican party have invariably been retired to private life, and not one of this class to-day occupies a seat in either branch of the Fifth-sixth Congress nor any prominent position within the State of North Carolina. That party within the past few years has had the effrontery in my State to approach the Populist party and ask for their cooperation and to claim that there was no distinction between the Populist party and the Republican party upon this great financial question. Can it be that the leaders of the party in my State have no fixed political convictions and that they are guided simply by their desire for the spoils of office? The Republican member of this House from my State, the distinguished gentleman from the Eighth district, Mr. LINNEY, has frequently made speeches in his district and boldly claimed that he was a bimetalist and that he would omit no opportunity to favor any legislation which recognized the use of both gold and silver as basic metals.

The distinguished senior Senator from my State, Mr. PRITCHARD, has pledged himself openly and before the people to vote for the restoration of silver to its ancient rights as a money metal whenever such a proposition should come before the Senate as a separate bill.

My colleagues in this House know that when it was charged against the Republican party in our State that they were in favor of the gold standard that in every instance they stood before the people and with unabashed effrontery said, "We are as much in favor of bimetalism as you are, the only difference between us being that we wish it through international agreement."

Yet, in the face of this record of the Republican party in my State, the distinguished gentleman, Mr. LINNEY, made a speech this week upon this floor in which he claimed that he had undergone a contrite repentance and experienced a glorious conversion by which he had abandoned his beautiful theories of bimetalism and was now in favor of this bill. What has caused this change of front? At the feet of what Gamaliel has he studied this question and imbibed so much new wisdom? Has he been worshipping at the altar of Mammon? Has he been listening to the siren voices of the prosperous bondholders or was the whip of the party lash applied in the Republican caucus which brought about this repentance and his bright conversion? He will in all probability have an opportunity of explaining to the people of North Carolina the details of this remarkable conversion and of telling them how the scales of ignorance fell from his eyes, and it is to be hoped that he will accompany his explanation with stereopticon views of the beautiful process.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said that of all the promises that the bimetalists had made in 1896 not a single one has come true. The error of this statement has been most ably controverted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. No one rejoices at the prosperity which certain sections and industries of our country are enjoying more than myself. We said in 1896 that a greater volume of money, sufficient to meet the necessities not only of the financial centers but of the great agricultural sections of our country, was necessary in order to enhance prices, and we said, further, that enhanced prices indicated prosperity and that low prices indicated hard times. To-day we have a greater volume of money than we had in 1896 and to this fact is most largely attributable the present degree of prosperity.

How has the volume of money been increased? Not by legislation, but because the world's supply of gold has been increased. The wealth of the Klondike has been coined at our mints; the gold fields of South Africa have yielded the golden metal in unexampled quantities, and from various other sources the production of gold has largely increased, and, having the rights of free mintage at all the mints of the world, the increase of gold has entered into the channels of commerce and trade and industrial business, so that this partial prosperity offers affirmative proof of the correctness of our position which we maintained in 1896. What will you do when the world's production of gold is curtailed or when it fails to keep pace with the increase of population and commerce and industry of the business world? Then will it be that the falsity of your position and the soundness of our faith will be amply illustrated, and the blow which you are aiming to-day at the vital part of the American body politic will take its full effect, and the people will indignantly remove from power and place the party which inflicted so vital a wound.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana, I believe it was, said that there was not a section in all these United States which was not prosperous. If he will go into the great tobacco belts of my State and of other States he will observe a condition very far removed from prosperity. In that golden belt of my State which produces the finest bright tobacco there was prosperity fifteen years ago. Tobacco sold at remunerative prices and yielded a fair profit upon the investment. Farm lands were in demand and sold at high prices, and yet the condition is reversed to-day. Tobacco sells at barely the cost of production, if so much, and lands that were formerly not upon the market may now be purchased at a ruinous sacrifice. This result has been largely effected by the tyrannical and ruinous methods of the great tobacco trust. Just as gold has been made the standard of value throughout the world and is controlled by the few, so has the great tobacco industry been absorbed by one gigantic corporation, which is to-day controlling the prices of the leaf tobacco of the farmers and of the manufactured product of the country. No government can be said to be "A government of the people, for the people, and by the people" so long as such a condition is possible under the forms of law.

There are many trusts, with a capital of millions of dollars, which control many of the staple products of the fields and of the mines and of the factories, but there is one other trust which overshadows all the others, as the great mountain overtops the valley below, and this is the great gold trust of the world.

It would be interesting to know the exact number of financial institutions and individuals in the United States which control the gold bullion and coin in this country, and, however few that number may be, it is still true that their number, in comparison to the population, is still less in the great powers of continental Europe, yet this metal, which is the only basic money and the money of ultimate redemption, is controlled by the few.

He who controls the money of a country controls prices, and he who controls prices with the power to enhance and diminish the prices of products has his hand upon the heart of the industrial and business world and can produce panics at his will, and who will deny that the holders of the gold of the world are closely allied together? And yet the Republican party is willing to go upon record in favor of fastening still more certainly these shackles upon the industrial world and of surrendering the great body of the people into the hands of this financial trust.

The bill under consideration is entitled "A bill to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes." The title of the bill is erroneous. It should be entitled "A bill to take from the Treasury millions of dollars and pay over to the holders of the bonds of the United States and to the holders of other bonds and evidences of indebtedness through the country." It is a bill dictated by the selfish and all-prevailing power of capital and greed. There is not one line in the bill in the interest of the wage-earners or the producers of the country.

As the representative of a people who are entitled to be heard upon this floor, I protest against its passage and shall cast my vote against it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to engage in a general discussion of the financial question. Debate may be regarded as futile when a decision has been reached (by the majority party in caucus) before it begins, as is true in reference to the bill under discussion. I shall therefore give but a brief expression of my objections to the pending measure.

This bill is not demanded in the platform of any political party. It protects no popular right or interest. It comes alone at the bidding of those upon whom it confers special powers and benefits. Its theory has no recognition in any school of political economy.

It makes the gold dollar the unit of value, thus erecting the gold standard. If any benefit could possibly arise from this provision to the public, it is destroyed by the subsequent provisions of the bill.

While gold is made the unit of value, all other moneys of the United States are made mere credit moneys as contradistinguished from gold and forced to rest on the gold for support or redemption, which is totally inadequate for this purpose, even in view of its increased production, and this inadequacy is confessed on the face of the bill by the provision authorizing the sale of gold bonds to purchase gold to maintain the "reserve of gold" in the Treasury, that the credit moneys may thereby be held at parity with the standard adopted.

Thus, under this system the maintenance of the parity of our moneys does not depend alone on the standard fixed, but partly on the indebtedness (by issuing bonds) that we may incur to obtain the standard money. It then follows that the parity of the moneys must at last be maintained by the credit of the Government. This credit, under another system, might be used without the intervention of a gold purchase and give the same stability to the currency that the bond issue in purchasing gold can give—the credit would be as effectual under one system as the other. It must, then, be clear that under the bill that the gold standard can not be maintained while other moneys may depend upon it for support without the aid of a bond issue to in turn support it. If this could have been done, good faith to the people on the part of the Republicans would have caused a provision for it in this bill, and the bond feature of the bill could have been omitted.

Bimetallism alone can accomplish this result. The Chicago platform affords a scientific solution of the question in the interest of the people.

The bill erects the gold standard, but it carefully provides for the destruction of gold as a circulating medium by making all other moneys the instruments of its withdrawal by forced redemption from the Treasury, thus absorbing the gold, contracting the currency, destroying the values of property, and again imposing the burdens of debt on the people by a bond issue in unlimited amounts to give stability to the currency so often as the gold reserve falls below $50,000,000.

The bill repudiates the existing contract between the United States and its bondholders in the interest of the bondholders and legislates additional value in bonds already issued and sold by making them payable in gold instead of coin, as provided in the bond—either gold or silver, at the Government's option. This provision is intended to enhance the value of the bonds in the market and will do so ultimately, since the purchasing power of the money they are now to be paid in will be increased as it is contracted, and the means of its contraction are ample in this bill, and the people must do the paying.

The power to issue bonds, or rather to determine the necessity for an issue and order the same, belongs to Congress and should be seldom exercised. The grant of this discretionary legislative power by the bill to the Secretary of the Treasury is unwise; its grant to issue such bonds in unlimited amounts is reckless.

The bill surrenders the power of Congress over money to national banks to a degree that is unsafe and dangerous. It is unwise to expect one who has power to bestow blessings on himself to practice self-denial for the public good.
